

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

FIFTH SESSION OF THE TWENTIETH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 10 DECEMBER, 1868, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 6 FEBRUARY, 1873, IN THE THIRTY-SIXTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 24th March, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—

Royal Assent—Local Government Provisional Orders [36 Vict. c. i].

BASTARDY LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

(NO. 29.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY

suggested that the Bill should be sent to the Committee pro forma. He would remind their Lordships that on the second reading he drew attention to the unsatisfactory state of the existing law with regard to cases of bastardy, and pointed out that even with the Amendment which this Bill proposed to make, no real improvement would be effected. As their Lordships were doubtless aware, the Bill had been introduced with the object of remedying a curious slip in the Act of last Session. It had been rendered necessary through a blunder of the other House, and it was no doubt highly necessary that the blunder should be rectified as soon as possible. But as the Legislature had commenced once more to deal with the matter he thought they should not confine themselves to the defect in the Act of last Session, but see to improve the whole law. At present the law was so complicated and puzzling that it was a troublesome and difficult matter to ascertain accurately how cases of this description should be dealt with. By way of illustration, he might refer to Clause No. 3, which altered certain forms in an enactment of 1845; but on referring to that Statute he found it was one explaining, referring to, and reciting another Act which had been repealed, so that some of the Act of 1845 rested on nothing at all, and Clause 3 of this Bill altered forms which had not now any existence at all. In fact, these forms were placed in mid-air, with nothing in particular for them to rest upon, and the clause referred to forms which had no legitimate existence whatever. It was not surprising that with such a law as this justices of the peace and others should be puzzled how to dispense the law, and that the law should work unsatisfactorily. No blame whatever rested on Mr. Charley who introduced the Bill in the other House—the alterations to which he had just referred were made during the progress of the Bill through that House. If their Lordships committed the Bill pro forma, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) would on the Report introduce Amendments which would repeal any portions of former Acts which it was necessary to deal with, and would re-enact any provisions in those Acts which it was thought necessary to continue. This he thought was a more workmanlike way of proceeding than that of referring to a number of previous Statutes without quoting the portions that were to remain in operation. He believed there was no difference on the matter between him and the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) who had charge of the Bill, and he thought the mode of proceeding which he proposed had the sanction of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees, whose opinion on questions of form their Lordships all so much respected. He might add that he did not think his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had any objection to the Amendments in point of form. He (the Marquis of Salisbury) begged, therefore, to move that the Bill be now committed pro forma, so as to enable him to have his Amendments printed. When the Bill next came before their Lordships they would have full opportunity for discussing any Amendments and additions which he might propose.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said that, as his noble Friend had explained, neither he nor Mr. Charley was answerable for the portion of the Bill that required correction. His only wish was to have the object of the Bill carried out in the most effective manner; and, therefore, he had no objection to the course proposed by the noble Marquess.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had looked over the Amendments which the noble Marquess proposed to insert in the Bill, and he could not see any objection to them in point of form. But he would suggest to his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill (the Earl of Shaftesbury) whether in its next stage a clause ought not to be introduced to confirm orders made by justices in ignorance of the flaw which had been discovered in the Act of last Session.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 44.)

CUSTODY OF INFANTS BILL—(No 38.)

(The Lord Chelmsford.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the object of the measure, which had come up from the Commons, was to extend the power of the Court of Chancery with regard to the custody of infants in cases where differences existed between the parents, and the family home had been broken up. Before 1839 the position of a wife, driven from her home and compelled to separate herself from her husband by reason of his misconduct, was very miserable; because she might have been deprived of all access to her infant children and from all intercourse with them. By an Act passed in that year, which was known as Talfourd's Act, that position was slightly alleviated. Talfourd's Act empowered the Court of Chancery not only to give the mother access to her children, but also to order them to be delivered up to her and remain in her custody till they were seven years old; but with regard to children above that age there was very little mitigation of the state of things existing previously to 1839. The position of a wife separated from her husband was rendered still more distressing in consequence of the manner in which the Court of Chancery dealt with separation deeds. At the present moment, by cruelty and adultery the husband might drive the wife from her home, and she, to avoid the scandal arising from proceedings in the Divorce Court, might agree to a deed of separation. This deed might contain a clause giving the children to the mother; but if so, the deed was not in the slightest degree binding, because if the husband did not choose to be bound by it, and refused to give her the children, and if she appealed to the Court of Chancery for its interpretation, the Court must refuse its aid on the ground that it was contrary to public policy for the husband to relinquish his duty in the care and management of his children. If the conduct of the husband had been so gross that in the opinion of the Court he was not a fit person to have the custody of his children the Court, might by means of a clause in the separation deed hand them over to the wife; but before the Court would take that step it must be proved to its satisfaction that the conduct of the husband had been so gross that the removal of the children was positively necessary in their own interests. No cruelty to the wife, and no adultery, except it were committed in the home of the children, would induce the Court of Chancery to enforce a separation deed of that kind. This rule of the Court had consequently the effect of preventing that which was so frequently sought—a private arrangement whereby the scandal of publicity was avoided. The Divorce Court had assumed the power of directing, in the case of a judicial separation, in the custody of which parent the children should remain; but no judicious adviser would counsel a wife to resort to the Divorce Court if a proper arrangement for herself and her children could be come to without recourse being had to such a step. The late Lord Penzance had stated a very strong opinion in favour of private deeds rather than Court orders for the separation of a husband and wife who had differences. There was another reason why private arrangements should be favoured—that private deeds left the door open for reconciliation, while proceedings in the Divorce Court completely closed it. The main clauses of this Bill were only two in number. The first empowered the Court of Chancery to order the wife access to and the custody of infants under 16 years old. That age was mentioned because it was the one at which in this country children had the legal right of choosing their own guardians. The second clause provided that no deed of separation was to be held invalid by reason of its containing a provision that the father shall give up the custody and control of the children to the mother; but there was a proviso that the Court need not enforce such a provision if it should be of opinion that it would not be for the benefit of the children to give effect to it. The third clause enacted that nothing contained in the Bill should render valid any agreement by the father to give up the custody of the children on condition of any pecuniary consideration to be paid to the father. He proposed to strike out that clause as unnecessary, seeing the power that was to be given to the Court of Chancery by the other clauses. Some persons were anxious to have this Bill extended to Scotland; but that could not be done, the law as regards infancy being quite different in Scotland from what it was in this country. In Scotland a child of 14 years old might choose its own guardian.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>"
—(The Lord Chelmsford.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that though he proposed to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill, according to Notice, he proposed that it should only be committed pro forma, and with the view of inserting, on the Report, Amendments which might be printed before the Bill came on to be regularly discussed in Committee. Under these circumstances, he hoped the noble Lord (Lord Denman) who had given Notice of a Motion to defer the Committee on the Bill for six months would not think it necessary to move that Amendment to the Motion which he was now about to make. He had intended, with the permission of their Lordships, that the Committee on the Bill should be taken next Monday; but as the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) had postponed his Notice on the subject of the works at Alderney to that evening, he would name to-morrow week for discussing this Bill in Committee.

Moved, "That the House be now put into a Committee on the said Bill."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD DENMAN, yielding to the request of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, would not move his Amendment.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 1st of April next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 45.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow,
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 24th March, 1873.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Coal, Mr. John Stewart Hardy discharged, Mr. Elliot added.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [March 21] reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—Resolutions [March 21] reported.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps it may be for the convenience of the House if I now make an announcement with reference to the course of Business before Easter so far as the Government are concerned. My right hon. Friend the

The Lord Chancellor

First Lord of the Admiralty has, I hope, been able to make arrangements for getting into Committee of Supply to-night, and I trust that he will be able to obtain the first Vote, because it is essential for the public service that money should be taken for naval purposes during the present week. Thursday we shall give up to those unofficial Members who treated us so courteously in giving way to enable us to proceed with the University Education (Ireland) Bill. Next week it will be requisite to make some further progress with the Estimates if we can, but especially to proceed with the Committee on the Bill of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade—the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill—so that, if possible, we may make effectual progress with the measure before Easter. On Monday, the 7th of April, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to submit the Financial Statement; but he will not ask of the House any Vote which will, in any degree, tend to prejudge any question that the Statement may raise or may be thought to raise. As to the Adjournment of the House for the Easter holidays, we propose to take it either on Monday, the 7th, or Tuesday, the 8th, whichever date may be most convenient, and to re-assemble on Monday, the 21st of April.

BOARD OF TRADE—PORTPATRICK HARBOUR—QUESTION.

MR. AGNEW asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the Light at Portpatrick Harbour will be maintained?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that the light would be maintained, and the necessary provisions for that purpose would be inserted in the Portpatrick Harbour Bill, now before the House.

HAMPTON COURT GREEN.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES DILKE asked the Chief Commissioner of Works, If he has received a protest, from the Homage of the Manor of Hampton Court, against the erection of a close fence, about eight feet in height, inclosing a portion of Hampton Court Green, which inclosure is asserted to be contrary to the award made on the passing of the Hampton Inclosure Act, 1812; and, whether the erection of such fence has been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Office of Works; and, if not, whether it is the intention of the representatives of the Crown to take steps to abate the encroachment.

Mr. AYRTON: In consequence of information I received I communicated with the owners of the property adjoining this ground, and requested that the fence should be removed. I am informed that the owners of the property have complied with the request.

JURIES ACTS (IRELAND).—QUESTIONS.

Mr. VANCE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of any Communications made to Government by the Chamber of Commerce of Dublin, or any other public bodies in Ireland, in reference to the qualification for Jurors under the Acts of 1871 and 1872?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had no objection to publish the communications though he thought the more convenient course would be to lay them, not on the Table of the House, but before the Select Committee for which it was proposed to move to inquire into the subject.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any of Her Majesty's Judges have made any Reports upon the Juries Act (Ireland); and, if so, whether he would have any objection to lay them upon the Table of the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he was not aware that any of the Judges had made any formal Report on the operation of the Act, though no doubt unofficial communications had been received from some of them. As it was intended to inquire into the operation of this Act by means of a Select Committee, it would probably be convenient that some of the Judges should be examined by that Committee.

MERCANTILE MARINE— THE "HINDOO" AND "PARGA." QUESTIONS.

Mr. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has caused any inquiry to be made into the condition of the case of the "Hindoo," preparing to leave Plymouth for India, after having been twice obliged to put back from alleged unseaworthiness, and also into the case of the "Parga," now lying in the Saint Katherine Docks, and destined for Buenos Ayres; or, if not, whether he will do so?

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, I will tell the hon. Gentleman all that I have been able to learn about the ships to which he called my attention three days ago. On hearing from him I immediately took steps to ascertain the truth with respect to these vessels. First, as to the steamship Hindoo, I find the state of the facts as far as I can learn is as follows:—The Hindoo was built on the Clyde for a Hull firm named Wilson and Co. I am told she cost £70,000, and her gross tonnage was 3,000 tons. She was built under the survey of the Liverpool Underwriters Association, and classed A 1 for 20 years—the highest class that can be given. She was surveyed by the Board of Trade surveyors at Glasgow, and obtained her passenger certificate. She came to London, and was again surveyed, and being destined for the Calcutta trade she sailed from London for that port. She met with bad weather and put in at Plymouth—where she was to have called for passengers—considerably damaged, with her steam-pipe valve injured, her steering gear out of order, and the ship making water, more or less. She was surveyed again at Plymouth by the surveyors of the Liverpool Underwriters Association and passed by them; but the Board of Trade surveyor was not satisfied, and her Board of Trade certificate was cancelled. She was sent back to London, where she discharged her cargo and where she was repaired and strengthened, I am informed, at a large expense. She went again on her voyage and put in at Plymouth to take up passengers. There was a trifling defect in her steam-pipe, but nothing at all serious. She proceeded on her voyage, and is, I believe, now at Port Said. So much for the Hindoo. I ought to add, that just as I came to the House, I had information from her owner that she had been insured for £45,000, and is valued at £80,000. With respect to the other vessel, the Parga, she was found in St. Katherine Docks. She was surveyed by the Board of Trade surveyors, who, so far as they can judge from the appearance of the ship, consider her unseaworthy. She was declared unseaworthy, and steps have been taken to prevent her going to sea, under the recent Act of 1871. I have to thank the hon. Gentleman for enabling me to put these powers in motion. This is the first time the hon. Gentleman has given me information of unseaworthy ships that have come to his knowledge, and I am glad that in this instance information was given which may prevent an unseaworthy ship going to sea.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked a Question of which he had given private Notice—namely, Whether the Board of Trade had received any information with respect to two ships named the Knight Templar and the Paladin? According to the information which had reached him the Knight Templar, an entirely new ship, went to sea with a cargo on the 1st of February, and on the 3rd of February, 48 hours afterwards, she foundered and sank. The Paladin, as he understood, was also a new ship, and, having just gone to sea, was seriously injured. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Board of Trade to institute an inquiry as to the circumstances attending the disasters to those vessels?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, that the Knight Templar was a new ship, Class A 1 for twenty years in the Liverpool Underwriters Association, and she had also a Board of Trade passenger certificate. It was a fact that she had been lost on her first voyage, and an inquiry would be made into the circumstances. With respect to the Paladin, as some preliminary steps were necessary before an inquiry should be ordered, he would say nothing further about her at present.

IRELAND—CIVIL SERVICE—REPORTS OF THE COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. PLUNKET asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will now lay upon the Table of the House the Reports made to the Government before the beginning of the present Session by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the case of the Irish Civil Service?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (for The Marquess of HARTINGTON) said, that three Reports had been received, one at the beginning of the Session, the other two more recently. There had not been time to consider the Reports, and as they contained matters of great importance, it would not be proper to lay them on the Table before the Government had an opportunity of making up its mind on the subject. He could not say how soon they would be able to do so.

POST OFFICE—NEWSPAPERS.

QUESTION.

MR. M'MAHON asked the Postmaster General, What is the object of the Post Office Regulation that

"All publications registered for transmission abroad must be posted within eight days from the date of publication, including that day; and any newspaper posted more than eight days after the date of publication, as well as any unregistered publication, must be prepaid at the book rates of postage?"

and, what is the average annual number of newspapers and publications infringing the above regulation, which are consequently lost both to the senders and addressees, and what becomes of them?

MR. MONSELL: The object, Sir, of the Regulation is to prevent the posting of large masses of newspapers just before the despatch of a mail, which would obviously cause great inconvenience to the Post Office. In order, however, to provide for the transmission of newspapers more than eight days old, they may be posted at the book-rate of postage. The number of newspapers more than eight days old and of unregistered publications posted during the year 1872 was about 118,000, of which about 11,800, or a tenth part, were returned to the senders; the remainder being disposed of, after a short detention, as waste paper. The number of such newspapers is, owing to the measures adopted by the Department, continually diminishing.

ARMY—(INDIA)—SUPPLY OF BREECH-LOADERS.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that the native troops of the Indian Army are not armed with breechloaders; and, if so, to what reason it is to be attributed?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the noble Lord, I have to say that as the whole of the British troops in India are now armed with the Snider Rifle, the Enfield rifles formerly used by them are being distributed to the native troops. The Enfield rifle being superior to any weapon which the native troops can for a long time be called on to face, it was the opinion of the Government of India that this was the best arrangement to adopt for the present, as it was of course the most economical.

ARMY—RELIEFS—NORTH AMERICA AND THE WEST INDIES.

QUESTION.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Why the recent relief of troops in North America and the West Indies was carried out at seasons interdicted by the Queen's Regulations, paragraph 1172; whether this contravention of the order regulating reliefs might not have been avoided by sending Her Majesty's ship "Tamar" to North America, and Her Majesty's ship "Himalaya" to the West Indies; and, whether he can state the lowest point, as recorded in the ships logs, at which the thermometer stood during the outward voyage of the "Himalaya" and the homeward voyage of the "Tamar?"

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, the Regulations provided how reliefs should be carried out as far as practicable, but there was no absolute direction. No doubt the War Office and the Admiralty had endeavoured to carry out the system as indicated in the Regulations. In the present case the reliefs could not be carried out in the manner suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, because the Tamar had only just taken out troops to the West Indies and Bermuda, and she arrived so late that it was impossible for her to make the return voyage in time. The Himalaya came from the Cape, and during her passage encountered very rough weather, which occasioned her some damages which it was necessary to repair, and that caused some delay. In going out, too, she encountered particularly bad weather. The lowest point at which the thermometer stood during the outward voyage of the Himalaya was twenty-three degrees, near Halifax. He was not able to give the state of the thermometer in the case of the Tamar.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take into his consideration the propriety of granting to Militia Adjutants in Ireland the same allowance for a servant as that allowed to Sub-Inspectors of Constabulary?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, Before 1859 Adjutants of Militia received no allowance for servants; but since the Report of the Royal Commission they have received the same allowance as officers of the Army and Adjutants of Volunteers. It is not intended to make any difference between them.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870.

QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Vice President of the Council, When he will introduce the Bill for the amendment of the Education Act of 1870?

MR. W. E. FORSTER in reply, said, that from what his right hon. Friend at the Head of the Government had stated with regard to the Business before Easter, his hon. Friend would not be surprised to find that he would not be able to bring in the Bill before the holidays. If his hon. Friend would put the Question again before the holidays, he would endeavour to give a more precise and satisfactory answer.

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN—THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the recent resignation of Her Majesty's Government has produced any change in the official emoluments of the present Attorney General, in consequence of the Treasury Minute which has lately modified those emoluments in the case of Law Officers of the Crown appointed subsequently to 1872?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER in reply, said, that the event alluded to by the hon. Gentleman would not produce any change in the official emoluments of the Attorney General. The change in the emoluments of the Law Officers of the Crown was brought about mainly by the Act of last Session, and the Treasury Minute had no force except by that Act, which expressly exempted his hon. and learned Friend from its operation. His hon. and learned Friend held his office by a Patent which was granted some years ago, which was still in full force and virtue.

FRANCE—TREATY OF COMMERCE, 1860.
QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What arrangements have been made by Her Majesty's Government for the protection of British interests, in consequence of the recent termination of the French Treaty of Commerce of 1860, pending the ratification by the Government of France of the new Commercial Treaty with that country?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Her Majesty's Government did not fail to make representations to the French Government on the subject, and the following Law, continuing the existing Treaty Tariff, was passed on the 14th instant by the French National Assembly, and has been promulgated by the French Government:—

"Les Tarifs conventionnels resteront en vigueur jusqu'à l'application des Tarifs nouveaux votés ou à voter par l'Assemblée Nationale."

And the following translation—

"The Conventional Tariffs will remain in force until the application of the new Tariffs passed or to be passed by the National Assembly"— was published in The London Gazette of the 18th instant.

IRELAND — GALWAY MAGISTRACY—CASE OF MR. DICKSON.—QUESTION.

COLONEL COLE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in a letter which appeared in "Saunders's Newsletter," of the 6th February, signed by Alexander Dickson, that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland superseded Mr. Dickson in the Commission of the Peace for the county of Galway, on the grounds that he had neither residence nor property in that county; whether this statement is accurate; and, whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, before issuing such supersedeas, made inquiry as to whether Mr. Dickson had any property in that county, and from whom?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had made inquiries into the circumstances of the case, which were as follows:—For some time past a revision of the Irish magistracy had been in progress, and Returns had been asked for from various counties. In the Return furnished to the Lord Chancellor by the Lieutenant of the county of Galway the following entry appeared:—

"Alexander Dickson—Was an agent. Has now left county."

The usual printed Circular asking for information as to the county of Galway was, on the receipt of the Lieutenant's Return, sent by the Lord Chancellor's Secretary to Mr. Dickson. To this Circular Mr. Dickson replied in a letter, from which the following is an extract:—

"That I am proprietor of property with an annual rental of several hundred pounds in the counties of Galway and Roscommon; that I annually visit the former county, and occasionally act as a Justice of the Peace; that I have let my residence in Galway for a short term of years; that my duties as a land agent require my frequent presence in the counties of Fermanagh and Monaghan; that Lord Erne, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Fermanagh, has promised to recommend me for the Commission of the Peace on my procuring a residence in that county, but I have been unable to procure such residence; that I expect if his Lordship exercises his discretion of removing me from the Commission of the Peace of Galway he will grant me the Commission for Fermanagh."

This letter came before the Lord Chancellor when revising the list for Galway, and his Lordship directed Mr. Dickson's name to be removed on the following grounds—1. The want of residence. 2. That his property, if any, in Galway was too small to warrant retaining on the roll the name of a non-resident gentleman. Notice having been given to Mr. Dickson of the expulsion of his name from the list on the ground of want of property and residential qualification, that gentleman wrote to the Lord Chancellor a letter dated January 23, 1873, containing the following statement:—

"I have property in the county of Galway. Any statement to the contrary is untrue."

To the last letter a reply was given, from which the following is an extract:—

"I am desired by the Lord Chancellor to acquaint you that his Lordship will be happy to re-instate you in the Commission of the Peace for the county of Galway on being informed as to the nature and extent of your property in that county."

This information has never been given by Mr. Dickson, and therefore no step has been taken towards restoring his name to the list. Mr. Dickson was also informed that the Lord Chancellor would favourably consider any recommendation of him by Lord Erne, the Lieutenant of Fermanagh. No reply had been received to that communication.

UNITED STATES—THE GENEVA AWARD.—QUESTION.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he intends to make provision for the payment of the sum awarded by the Tribunal of Geneva in the month of September last, out of the balance yielded by the excess of revenue collected in the current quarter; and, if so, whether any vote with that object will be proposed to the House in the course of this week before the close of the financial year on the 31st instant, at which date the surplus of the quarter will become vested and appropriated by statute to other purposes?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is not intended to propose any Vote during the course of the present week, or with reference to the finance of the present year. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he makes his Financial Statement, will, of course, state the views of the Government with reference to the method of making provision for the sum due to America under the Award made by the Tribunal of Geneva; but I may state, what probably the hon. and learned Member may not be aware of, that if such a Vote were taken during the course of the present week, as his Question appears to suggest, it would be necessary to make the payment at once to America; for if the payment were not made at once to America, the sum must be returned to the Exchequer before the end of the financial year. And with regard to making the payment at once to America, it ought to be borne in mind that this country is already called on, as a portion of the sum we have been adjudged to pay, to pay very large sums in the shape of interest of money, although that sum for interest is not specifically due at the present time. But we have not thought it our duty to make a charge on the present year in respect of a sum, the proper time for settling which will not arise for several months.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—INSPECTORS AND HEALTH OFFICERS.
QUESTION.

MR. CORRANCE asked the President of the Local Government Board, in consequence of a letter recently issued from the Local Government Board respecting the appointment of Inspectors and Health Officers, Whether it is the intention of the Local Government Board to issue any general instructions to the local authorities concerning their appointments, indicating with greater precision the intention of the Local Government Board to disallow subventions, or to prohibit certain appointments?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, he was not aware of the letter to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and he did not think it would be desirable to issue any further general instructions more precise or more rigid than those which had been for some time issued with regard to the appointment of medical officers and inspectors. The policy of the Local Government Board was not to tie the hands of the local authorities by minute restrictions, but to consider each case on its own merits, and to spare neither time nor patience in discussing with the local authorities what might be best for their own interest. If his hon. Friend wished to move for any letters which had been issued he would be happy to lay them on the Table.

LOCAL TAXATION—EXEMPTION OF REAL PROPERTY.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN ST. AUBYN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to pass an Act this Session to abolish the exemption now enjoyed by such real property as does not at present contribute towards local rates?

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he wished, before the right hon. Gentleman replied, to ask, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a comprehensive measure on this subject as indicated in the Speech from the Throne, and as promised before the end of last Session by the First Lord of the Treasury; or whether the measure intended to be brought forward would be of a piecemeal character? There being now no great question before the House, he wished, also, to know when it is intended to introduce the Bill.

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, with regard to the Question of his hon. Friend the Member for West Cornwall (Sir John St. Aubyn) he had to state that the Government proposed to introduce, and he hoped they would be able to pass, a measure of which the repeal of the exemption of certain classes of real property from local rates would form a part. With respect to the Question of his hon. Friend the Member for South Devonshire (Sir Massey Lopes) of which he had not received sufficient notice to enable him exactly to anticipate the nature of his Question, all he could say was that he was not able at that moment to define the extent of the measure, one portion of which he had just explained. As far as his individual opinion was concerned, having had no opportunity of consulting his Colleagues, it did not strike him as the most advisable course to endeavour to deal with the whole of the large subject which went popularly by the name of local government and local taxation, in one measure. As to the time when it would be introduced, whatever its dimensions, he was not able to answer the Question of the hon. Baronet on the spur of the moment.

EGYPT—SIR SAMUEL BAKER.

QUESTION.

LORD RONALD GOWER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information regarding Sir Samuel Baker has of late been obtained; and, whether any steps have been taken by the Khedive to rescue him from his supposed perilous situation?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Colonel Stanton reports from Cairo, under date March 5, that the Director of the British Indian Telegraph Company had received a telegram from Khartoum to the following effect:—

"Yesterday, the Governor of Soudan proceeded up the White Nile with nine boats, taking from Fashoda 500 soldiers, and I hear his object is to go to Gondokoro to meet Baker Pasha—Sir Samuel Baker—in order to supply him with provisions and whatever else he may require, also to ascertain his news, which will be communicated later."

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTIONS.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he wished to appeal to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Henry Lennox), to the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), and the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey), all of whom had Motions on the Paper on the Order for Supply, to postpone them, so as to enable them to proceed at once to the discussion of the Navy Estimates. It was most important that they should obtain some of the Votes before the 1st of April; and if the noble Lord and the other hon. Members gave way he would put down the Navy Estimates first on Thursday week, so as to enable them to bring on their Motions then.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that if the state of Business had been the same this year as it was last he must have refused the request of the right hon. Gentleman; but on the present occasion he was quite willing to accede to his appeal, on the understanding that they would have Thursday week for the Navy Estimates.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he was sorry he could not accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. He had given long Notice of his Motion; and as he stood first on the Paper he was anxious to persevere with it. They had already lost many weeks in efforts at sensational legislation, which had ended disastrously for the Government.

MR. BRASSEY consented to postpone the Motion of which he had given Notice respecting the Naval Reserves.

SUPPLY.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE rose to call attention to the subject of the Half-pay of Officers of the Navy of all ranks. The hon. and gallant Baronet said, that the changes and chances of this life were so uncertain that he could not accede to the request of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, but must seize the present opportunity of bringing forward his Motion. Hon. Members must all deplore the loss of one (the late Mr. Corry) who had for so many years assisted in their deliberations, and whose great ability and experience had shed a light on naval questions which no other Member of this House could possibly supply. The Motion he had to submit to the consideration of the House had reference to the inadequacy of the half-pay of officers of the Navy. The proportion of officers on half-pay was as follows:—Captains, 63 per cent; commanders, 49 per cent; lieutenants, 33 per cent; navigating lieutenants, 35 per cent; paymasters and secretaries, 38 per cent; and surgeons, 35 per cent. It was quite clear that gentlemen in enforced retirement occupied a position of very great difficulty. Under the retirement scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), the active lists of captains and commanders respectively underwent a reduction to 150 and 200. In January, 1870, there were upon the list 292 captains and 401 commanders; now the numbers were 226 and 309. In 1868 there were 107 captains and 190 commanders employed; now there were only 85 captains and 158 commanders. Yet his right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), in moving the retirement scheme, held out the hope of more frequent employment as one of the inducements for its adoption. Then the Government proceeded to reduce the following appointments for naval officers:—The dockyards at Deptford, Woolwich, and the Cape of Good Hope, the senior officer at Ascension, the victualling yard at Plymouth, the receiving ships at Portsmouth and Plymouth, the barracks at Sheerness, the captain superintendent of packets at Southampton, the deputy controller of the Coastguard, the naval attachés at Paris and Washington, and commodores in the South Pacific, the East Indies, and Brazil. Besides, there had been a general reduction of the squadrons on foreign stations. He particularly desired to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the half-pay of commanders had not been increased since the year 1813. The number of Good Service Pensions had been reduced from 25, as settled by the Order in Council of February, 1870. The fact that those pensions were to be 25 in number induced many persons to accept the new scheme; but on the 9th of August, 1872, the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Admiralty reduced the number to 12. This he held to be a deliberate breach of faith. According to the retirement scheme of his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract, the captains who might have arrived at the age for retirement, but who had not served the whole of the time necessary to qualify them for their flag rank, were not allowed to assume the title of rear-admiral upon reaching the top of their list. This was felt to bear hard upon such retired captains, as they were the only branch of the service who were not allowed an honorary step; and, moreover, these were officers who for the most part had served long and well in the junior ranks, but lacking interest, had not risen as fast as their younger brethren. He wished to draw the attention of the House to the difference between the half-pay of officers in America and in this country. In our Navy the first 50 captains on the list received £301 2s. 6d. a-year half-pay; the second 50 received £264 12s. 6d.; and the remainder £228 2s. 6d. In the United States Navy, however, all captains who were "awaiting orders," or, in other words, on half-pay, received £583 6s. 8d. a-year. Again, in the British Navy the first 100 commanders on the list received £182 10s. a-year, and the remainder £155 2s. 6d.; while in the United States Navy all commanders unemployed or "awaiting orders, received £479 3s. 4d. Formerly our officers, when employed, had many opportunities of supplementing their resources by prize money, salvage, and freight money, but these now scarcely existed except in name. The appointments of captains commissioning ships were in many cases only made for two years; they were unable, in consequence, to clear off the debt which they were obliged to incur for their outfit, and which remained an incubus when they reverted to their miserable half-pay, leaving them, in point of fact, worse off than when they obtained the appointment for which they had waited so many years. Captains and commanders were excluded from the rule granting all other officers a certain amount of full-pay leave when returning from lengthened foreign service. This was unjust, especially as officers in command had to remain for some time in the vicinity of the port where their ships were paid off to sign papers and clear their accounts. He would now refer to the grounds on which he asked for an increase of the half-pay of the officers of the Navy. One hundred years ago—in February, 1773—an increase of half-pay was granted to the officers of our Navy. Such great importance was attached to the circumstance that the Royal Naval Club resolved that there should be a call of all the members of the society to commemorate it, and that the healths of the several speakers on the occasion should be drunk in bumpers—namely, Lord Howe, Captain Pigott, Captain Phipps, Sir G. Saville, Colonel Barry, Lord John Cavendish, Sir Gilbert Elliott, Mr. Hawke, Mr. Grosvenor, Mr. Boscawen, Mr. Mackworth, Sir William Meredith, Sir Piercy Brett, and Mr. Dowdeswell. Moreover, the several sea officers instrumental in passing the vote of the House of Commons for augmenting the half-pay were invited to dine with the society. He only wished that there was such a phalanx of naval officers in the House now as there was then. This was exactly 100 years ago. The scale of half-pay of captains prior to the change referred to was per diem to the first 20, 10*s.*; to the next 30, 8*s.*; to the next 40, 6*s.*; to the remainder, 5*s.*; masters and commanders, 4*s.* The increase appeared to have been as follows:—As addition of ten captains to the 10*s.* list; 20 to the 8*s.* list; and to the remainder (including masters and commanders), 6*s.* The price of provisions had gone up 100 per cent. The Royal Naval Club of 100 years ago contracted for their dinners at 2*s.* 6*d.* a head in Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; the master of the Club remonstrated upon the inadequacy of the charge, and the result was that the 2*s.* 6*d.* was raised to 3*s.* He had gone into details far later than 100 years ago, and he would state to the House the rapid rise in the price of provisions, which had taken place within the last 15 years. In the interval between 1858 and 1872 the increase in the price of bacon had been 46 per cent; in beef 47 per cent; in bread 31 per cent; in butter 67 per cent; in cheese 40 per cent; in coals 45 per cent—but his Return was drawn up before the enormous increase in the price of coals, which at present amounted to 150 per cent—in lard 44 per cent; in mutton 29 per cent; in potatoes 81 per cent; being an average rise of 42 per cent. It was true there was a slight decrease on rice, which nobody used much, and on tea and coffee. Under these circumstances it was perfectly impossible that officers could maintain the position which they ought to retain. The first class of officers in the Navy, the warrant officers, the men who were the pick of the force, had told him that they could not maintain the position which they were expected to maintain upon the pittance which they received. If they came to education, manner of living, the society of the country, the pay of the Navy rendered a man an outcast if he could not hold an income which with economy enabled him to live up to the station of the persons with whom he associated, and it was impossible for officers in the Navy, or post captains, to live upon their pay. The same lamentable state of circumstances was felt by the artificer. He had personal knowledge of the fact that great hardship was inflicted upon the officers of the Navy in consequence of the miserable pay they received, and that, too, at a time when the country was overflowing with riches, when people could afford to give £1,200 for a box at the opera, and when some hon. Members, after giving £1,000 for a picture, came down to the House and voted for the reduction of the wretched pay of a Government clerk. Whatever Government was in office—whether the present or that which was looming in the distance—he would tell the occupants of the Treasury Bench that it was their duty and their interest to see that the defenders of the country were adequately paid for their services. He warned the Ministry that, although there was no kind of fear of invasion, yet that we were entirely dependent upon foreign countries for corn, and there might be some kind of combination against us when it would be absolutely necessary for us to have a strong fleet in the Bay of Biscay to protect Falmouth Harbour. So long as he had a seat in that House—and there were some seats which were not so safe as his—he should continue to urge the grievances of the officers of the Navy upon the attention of the House and the Government until they were redressed.

MR. GOSCHEN said that before he replied to the question of the hon. and gallant Baronet he desired to echo the regret he had expressed at the loss which the House had sustained by the death of one who had never been absent from his place when any question affecting the interests of the Royal Navy was under discussion. Opposed as he and his Colleagues were to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) in politics and on many questions of naval administration, he nevertheless could bear witness to the fact that the naval service considered that the right hon. Gentleman had mastered subjects connected with the Navy with a success seldom attained by civilians, and he (Mr. Goschen) was sure that the news of the right hon. Gentleman's death would be received with unfeigned regret throughout Her Majesty's men-of-war. With respect to the question raised by the hon. and gallant Baronet, he would not follow him into the subject of the increased cost of the necessaries of life. The hon. and gallant Baronet had spoken of the inadequacy of the half-pay in various ranks of the service, and he admitted, as his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had done, that one of the weak points of the service was the large number of officers who were placed on half-pay. It was with the deepest regret that he saw commanders, when promoted to the rank of captain, remaining four, five, and six years on half-pay before they received a command. His right hon. Friend had given that subject his attention, and had instituted a policy by which the number of sufferers had been greatly decreased. The figures he was about to quote would show the beneficial result which had followed the adoption of the policy to which he referred. On the 1st of April, 1870, when the scheme came into operation, the number of officers of all ranks on half-pay was 1,258. On the 1st of April, 1872, the number had been reduced to 838, or by more than 400. That was a considerable amount of progress, and he believed it would continue, and that the time would come when the retirement scheme of his right hon. Friend would be fully appreciated by the Navy. On the 1st of April, 1870, 89 captains were employed, and 199 were on half-pay, while on the 1st April, 1872, there were 87 captains employed, or only two less than in 1870, while there were 146, or 53 less than in 1870 on half-pay. With the commanders the same was the case. On the 1st April, 1870, the number of commanders employed was 171, the number on half-pay being 231; while on the 1st April, 1872, there were 156 employed and 156 on half-pay. The process was slower than he could wish, and he was not disposed to do anything to diminish the tendency of officers to retire until the point had been reached at which the numbers had been fixed by the Order in Council. He would admit that the rate of half-pay was low, and it was said that he had dealt with it in an inadequate manner by adding 2s. to the half-pay. It was assumed that the Admiralty endeavoured to find a fund for increasing the half-pay by diminishing the number of Good-Service Pensions. The Admiralty, however, went on a totally different principle. The 25 Good-Service Pensions created by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) were found to involve very great difficulties. The money was voted annually; but these Good-Service Pensions, although they might be bestowed upon an officer on full-pay, could not be held by him. It happened that through the employment of senior officers on the list not less than 15 out of 17 who were in receipt of Good-Service Pensions were on full-pay, and, consequently, the pensions could not be enjoyed by those officers, although they had them attached to their names. It might be asked why the Admiralty did not give these pensions to the officers next on the list. He had examined that question also, and had found that of the next 17 officers distinguished for conspicuous services all but three were employed on full-pay. If the Admiralty had gone on distributing these pensions among the next 17, not less than 14 were employed and could not receive them. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE dissented.] The hon. and gallant Gentleman said "No," but if he would look at The Navy List he would find it to be so. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE observed that what he had said was that "it was a delusion."] He (Mr. Goschen) thought that if a naval officer were on full-pay, and had a Good-Service Pension given to him which he could not enjoy, it would be indeed a delusion. The Admiralty found that there was a considerable number of officers entitled to these pensions who could not enjoy them as was intended, and there was thus a large balance every year which could not be distributed among the naval officers. The Admiralty then con-injustice, and was highly discreditable to the Government of the country, and it made Englishmen ashamed of such a course. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the matter, and remedy this discreditable state of things. He had intended to make a few remarks on the Navy Estimates which the right hon. Gentleman was about to bring forward; but the Rules of the House had been so frequently changed—and every one of those changes was calculated to prevent discussion—that he did not know whether he was at liberty to make such remarks. If it were clearly understood that, after the right hon. Gentleman had made his statement, the Members of the House would have full opportunity to discuss the Navy Estimates, he had no wish to trespass further on the House at present.

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not wish to enter into the general question, and would only observe that no Good Service Pension had been withdrawn either in 1870 or in 1872.

MR. G. BENTINCK inquired if there was any officer on full-pay who was at this moment in receipt of his Good Service pension?

MR. CHILDERS replied that no one had been deprived of the Good Service pension to which he was entitled before the new Regulations came into force. The hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) had quoted the totals of a Return which he (Mr. Childers) had moved for last Session, to show that no improvement had been made in the sums paid to officers. But he had omitted to give the numbers of those officers. In 1868 the sum of £1,765,000 was paid to 9,629 officers in respect of full-pay, half-pay, and retired-pay; but in 1872 the same amount was paid to 9,134 officers for those purposes; but that was not all. A vast improvement had been made by the Orders of 1870 in the proportion of officers employed to those on half-pay. A Return which had been made last Session showed that great relief had resulted to the service in consequence of the number of retirements which had occurred between 1870 and 1872. It appeared from that Return that in 1870 the number of officers in the Navy of the higher ranks was 3,585, and it was necessary that number should finally be reduced to 2,521. At the present moment the number had been reduced to 2,875—about two-thirds of the necessary reduction having been already effected. His right hon. Friend had explained that that reduction was a great boon to the Navy, and its beneficial effect would be felt more and more in future years. The immediate effect of the reduction was to take off the half-pay list—the most unsatisfactory list in any service—430 officers, and to reduce the total number on half-pay from 1,268 to 838.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE remarked that those gentlemen who had been removed from the half-pay list were no longer receiving half-pay.

MR. CHILDERS said, that was true; but they were receiving a far larger amount of retiring pay, which was a great boon to the whole service. The fact was that we had at that time a fearfully redundant list, and that it must be worked off, not in the interest of economy, because, as the hon. and gallant Baronet had shown, the charge was as great as ever, but in the interest of the service. The service was impaired every year from the circumstance that a large proportion of officers were kept two, three, four, and even five years in idleness, and this was at a time when mechanical improvement was going on at such a rate that no man could be absent from the service for any length of time without finding himself far behind in knowledge, and his efficiency being greatly impaired. There was only one way to remedy this—a determined and vigorous reduction in numbers. This he (Mr. Childers) had done much to effect. The effect of the Orders in Council of 1870 had been that whereas in the two years that preceded them only 492 officers had been promoted, in the two years that had succeeded them no less than 649 promotions had been made, and that while in the two previous years only 220 officers had retired or been pensioned, in the following two years no less than 1,299 had retired or been pensioned. But the hon. Baronet complained of the few promotions to flag rank. In reality they had been as many as before; but it so happened that for the first 16 months after the Orders were passed not a single flag officer had died, although the average was four or five per year, and therefore all the promotions were due to the retirements brought about by the Orders in Council referred to. He would not enter into the general question; but on these points he had felt it his duty to add his testimony to that of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, there was one point which had not been adverted to, and to which he wished to call attention. He had supported at every stage the abolition of purchase in the Army. Under the present system, he regretted to say that the door of the Navy was shut to all but the sons of wealthy men or rich men themselves. He could not conceive a more impolitic system than that which kept men, who ought to be able to live among their equals, in a state in which, when they went to sea, they were incapable of carrying on the duties which in many cases required great judgment and discretion. But, in addition to that objection, in no other public Department was the variation in the pay of a public servant so great. His own case afforded a very good illustration of that variation. Thus, 30 years ago, when he was receiving £180 per annum as half-pay, being suddenly appointed captain of a ship, he obtained £600 per annum for three years, at the end of which time his income was again reduced to the smaller sum. Again, 10 or 12 years ago, he was in receipt of £1,500 per annum, as Rear Admiral commanding a division of the Channel Fleet, and at 24 hours' notice he was compelled to haul down his flag—the notice being 27 days short of what a domestic servant was entitled to—when his professional income was reduced to £450 per annum. In his opinion this excessive variation in the income of our naval officers was most unfair and most unjust. He thought the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) was wrong in the statement he had made with regard to officers on full-pay receiving Good Service Pensions.

MR. GOSCHEN rose to remove the misconception which appeared to prevail with regard to the effect of the Orders in Council of 1870 and 1872, as to officers on full-pay receiving Good Service Pensions. Previous to 1870, officers both on full and on half-pay had been able to draw Good Service Pensions; but the Order of that date added to the Good Service Pensions, and changed their tenure and allowed the pension to be taken into retirement, but directed that in future they were not to be held by officers on full-pay. That Order, however, was not retrospective in its effect. The Order of 1872 restored prospectively to officers on full-pay the power of enjoying Good Service Pensions, but the effect of that Order also was not retrospective.

MR. RYLANDS remarked that the public, as well as half-pay officers, was interested in this question. Between 1859 and 1863, while the Duke of Somerset was First Lord of the Admiralty, the number of cadets appointed in the Navy was preposterously large, and the result had been that great difficulty had been experienced in providing places for them. He (Mr. Rylands) thought there ought to be a considerable and speedy reduction in the number of officers. If the naval interests of the country were to be intrusted to officers who had not sufficient knowledge or experience of their duties, the result could not fail to be disastrous. The taxpayers of the country had a right to expect that public money would not be given where there was no justification for an increase in the public charges. If the question was carried to a vote he should resist the claims of the officers.

In reply to MR. R. W. DUFF,

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had already stated that in future the Good Service Pensions might be held by officers in full service.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) 60,000 Men and Boys, Sea and Coast Guard Services, including 14,000 Royal Marines.

MR. GOSCHEN, in rising to move the Navy Estimates, said, the gross Estimates for the year 1873-4 amounted to £9,873,000, and after deducting extra receipts and repayments made to the Treasury, amounting to £240,000, there remained a net charge on the revenue for the coming year of £9,633,000. The present Estimates showed an increase over those of 1872-3 of £340,000. Before he dealt with the causes which had led to that excess, he wished to make a few remarks with reference to the services which had to be performed by the Navy for the money which was voted by Parliament. An hon. Gentleman had spoken the other day of our naval expenditure as our national premium of insurance—words which must be taken to imply insurance against hostile attack; in fact, the insurance of our power and prosperity. For his own part, he wished the Naval Estimates were nothing more, some hundreds of thousands might be saved out of the Estimates—we might even say millions—if that were so; but everyone who was conversant with the conduct of the business of the Admiralty must be aware that there were many duties which the Navy had to perform—costly duties, too—in time of the profoundest peace, a fact which he would beg hon. Members to take into account when they were asked to Vote £9,500,000 of the money of the taxpayers of this country. The Navy, for example, performed the whole of the Coastguard duties, not only for the protection of the coast, but for the protection of the revenue, there being 25 Coastguard cruisers. Then the Navy had to provide for the protection of our fisheries in the sense of police, not in the sense of protection against an enemy, and naval officers on board of men-of-war have often to perform magisterial duties. Then there were costly surveys to be made by our ships in various parts of the world. A great transport service had also to be performed, the number of soldiers to be moved in the course of the present year being 41,000, besides 8,000 women and children, 15,00 officers, and a certain number of horses. All this expenditure was not war expenditure. Again, we had to send ships to various parts of the world to suppress kidnapping, to look after the slave trade, and to discharge various other duties of a similar nature. There were, besides, certain duties to be performed for our Consular authorities, who were constantly, in all parts of the world, making demands on the Navy for the protection of lives and property of British subjects, not against an enemy, but in cases of internal disturbance and revolution. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had a few days ago stated that our expenditure must depend on our policy; but the duties which he had mentioned were duties which the country desired to see under all circumstances performed, and the Government of the day was always called pretty strictly to account if there was any failure in that respect. It would at once be seen, then, that in performing those duties a large amount was absorbed of the millions which were generally supposed to be laid out in simply making preparations for war, and that but for such expenditure much more money than was now available for the purpose could be devoted to building fighting ships and increasing our real naval strength. He would now call attention, in the first place, to the number of non-fighting ships which had to be continually kept up. There were round the coast for the training of boys, nine ships and six brigs, three ships for training naval cadets, and three ships and eight traders for the study of naval artillery and torpedoes. Then there were drill ships, 11 ships for the Naval Reserve, and 25 revenue cruisers for the Coastguard service. There were also stationary ships of various kinds, receiving ships, store ships, and hulks used for various purposes, 39 in number, four troop ships, five survey ships, and a number of yachts and small steamers for the Channel service. The total he arrived at was 138 ships for peace service only; and those ships had to be repaired as occasion required, and, worse still, replaced when worn out. This year, for instance, we take £15,000 in order to prepare the Marlborough to take the place of the gunnery ship Excellent. There are also five Indian troop ships, and then there are our shore establishments. Not to speak of all our great dockyards at home, we had 14 or 15 small dockyards abroad, each of which was a centre of expenditure. We had victualling yards at Deptford, Gosport, Plymouth, Gibraltar, Bermuda, and other places, and we had also medical establishments, a lunatic asylum at Yarmouth, barracks for marines, marine infirmaries, and all our educational establishments. He alluded to this in order that hon. Members who did not go into the details of the Estimates might see how a large portion of our money was necessarily spent before we came to the expenditure for actual fighting purposes, and he would remind hon. Gentlemen that these 138 non-fighting ships and this vast number of civil establishments for naval purposes abroad and at home are each a centre of expense which requires the most careful watching. While on the head of our centres of expenditure in time of peace, he would not omit the examination of our squadrons at sea. We had 11 squadrons at sea. There were the Channel and Mediterranean squadrons—which were our great fighting squadrons—and then there were the squadrons for the West Indies, for South America, for the Pacific, for Australia, for China, for the East Indies, and two for the African waters; and then there is the flying squadron. The Committee might think we had too large a number of these squadrons abroad, but he would remind them that when his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) came into office he reduced the number of ships on foreign stations, organized a flying squadron, and laid down a certain scale in accordance with which the ships were to be kept up. The present squadrons were not in excess of that scale. He would now state the case in a different form. We had 226 ships in commission, but the actual number of fighting ships was not more than 114. Of those 23 were iron-clads, 31 frigates and corvettes, 60 sloops and gunboats. France, on the other hand, had 8 iron-clads, 5 frigates, and 36 sloops and gunboats—making in all 49; Germany had 1 iron-clad, 6 corvettes and sloops, 4 gunboats and 1 despatch vessel—in all 12; while America had 2 iron-clads, 3 store-ships, and 40 other ships—making in all 45. Thus it would be seen that while England had 23 iron-clads, France, Germany, and the United States had only 11; and we had 91 frigates, corvettes, sloops and gunboats against their 95. Now, it might be asked whether we had not too many squadrons and too many ships in commission. He should like to know the view of the Committee upon that point. Well, where were our squadrons? We had a squadron on the East India station and one on the East Coast of Africa, which latter probably, if he was not very much mistaken, we should have to re-inforce with the concurrence of both sides of the House. Then they had a squadron on the Australian station, which the House, and hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway as much as any other hon. Members, would insist on their keeping sufficient to suppress kidnapping in the Southern Seas. Again, the state of Lagos, Sierra Leone, the Gambia, and other parts of the West Coast of Africa was not such that they could diminish their squadron there by a single ship. Then, in regard to the China squadron, there was a certain number of Treaty Ports to be watched, and the services of that station could not be conducted with a smaller force of ships. Therefore, although the aggregate might appear large, when they came to look into it, it was difficult to see how any of their squadrons could be reduced. He could not, he thought, too often remind the Committee and the country that if they required services to be performed the ships must be ready and prepared to perform them. Then there was another question—namely, how were they to employ their men? And he would here say that he was not prepared to recommend the Committee to reduce the number of seamen we had. The total number of men that appeared on the Votes was 60,000, the blue-jackets of course being only a part of that aggregate force. But it must be remembered that they had to recruit their seamen from boys; they had to train them. Their system was not such that they could enter them straight from shore without training. The consequence was they must always keep a certain number of sailors upon whom we could rely immediately on the outbreak of war. We could not get our sailors ready-made, and especially for the new class of ships and the new kinds of gunnery it was absolutely indispensable that there should be training. What, then, was to be done with these men? They must go to sea. It was impossible to keep in their ports on shore more than a certain proportion of their sailors. They must be kept at sea. If we were placed at a great disadvantage as regarded expenditure, compared with other countries, through our foreign squadrons, on the other hand we possessed an immense advantage as compared with foreign countries, because, having to keep our ships at sea, we were enabled to train our men. Our men, in fact, were making experiments on our ships in time of peace, instead of in time of war; they were learning their qualities, and our officers and crews were familiarizing themselves with these new classes of ships. Although there might be a difficulty in dealing with experimental ships, and although by having so many ships at sea they were liable to naval mishaps, still the Government felt that it would be wrong for any Board of Admiralty to keep their ships at home in order to avoid those risks to which from the beginning all men were exposed who “go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in great waters." Notwithstanding that he had a good deal to say to the Committee, he had thought it worth while to indicate what he called our peace establishment, and what were its duties. He would now speak of the excess of £340,000 upon these Estimates. The Estimates, as stated in the gracious Speech from the Throne—

"Have been framed with a view to the efficiency and moderation of our Establishments, under circumstances of inconvenience entailed by variations of an exceptional nature in the prices of some important commodities."

They had had to encounter dearer coal, dearer iron, and higher wages. They had had to pay an increased price on no less than 180,000 tons of coal. Their purchases of iron and metal articles, engines, and so forth, amounted to about £700,000 for the coming year; and business men would know what effect a rise in price must have on such an item as that. Again, by contract their expenditure for building iron, wooden, and composite ships was about £400,000—another item which was seriously affected by the rise in prices. Possibly the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) and others might say they must meet that increase of prices by reductions in other directions. In order to show how far that would be possible, let him recall to the Committee a statement which he had made on a previous occasion with regard to the proportion of their total expenditure which was spent on the personnel of the fleet on the one hand, and on the matériel on the other, and as to how much of it was elastic, and how much inelastic. Well, the Votes which constituted the personnel of the Navy—namely, the Wages, Victualling, Coast-guard, Medical Establishment, Half-pay and Pensions, Marines and Martial Law Votes—absorbed together, £5,565,000. Out of those Votes, it might be possible here and there to make reductions of a few thousands; but he must frankly say that if our Navy was to be equally as well paid, pensioned, fed, and doctored as it had hitherto been, he did not see that there was any great margin for saving on those Votes. Perhaps, it might be said they could reduce the number of men; but in recruiting for the Navy, it was a difficult thing to drop the number in any one year. They could only drop it by diminishing the number of boys, which would not affect the immediate year, but would give them so many fewer seamen in subsequent years. He had taken off 500 boys this year, not to decrease the number of sailors, but because they had found, after experience of the continuous service system for a given time, that with 3,000 boys they would be able to keep up the number of their sailors at about 18,000 or 19,000 the standard which they had fixed upon. Before the continuous service system came into operation, it was almost impossible to say what the necessary number would be. He was happy to say, also, that the waste among the boys had become considerably less. Last year, he had not scrupled to ask for an increase of 500 in the number of boys, because there was a gap through their not having entered the full 3,000 in some years; but, having increased the number, he had come, with the assistance of his naval colleagues, to the conclusion that 3,000 boys should be fixed upon, and therefore had taken off the 500 he had put on last year. He did not do that to diminish the number of men, but because 3,000 boys would be sufficient. Next came the Transport Vote, over which they had no control, the Vote for the Admiralty, the Scientific and Miscellaneous Votes, together making a total of £532,000. We might be able to reduce them by some few thousands, but the most rigid economist could not effect any such reduction there as would make up for increased prices. Then there were the great works at Chatham and Portsmouth, and the Vote for Works in general, and including contracts that had been entered into, which accounted for £682,000; then there was the Vote for Civil Pensions, which amounted to £296,000, over which they had no control. The result was that £7,077,000 formed the aggregate of the Votes belonging to the personnel of the Navy. That was expenditure of an inelastic description, and we had comparatively little control over it. If there was to be any reduction to meet the increased prices of materials, it could only come from the remaining Votes—namely, the Store Votes or the Dockyard Votes. Now, the Store Votes and the Building Votes last year amounted to £2,384,000, and this year they were £2,796,000. If he had come down to the House and asked for a Supplemental Vote for 1872-3 in consequence of the great increase in the price of coal, iron, and other materials, he thought this House would have been disposed to grant it; and they could not have complained if, in a year of unexampled rise in prices, they had been unable to keep within their Estimates. During the whole time he had been in office the expenditure had not exceeded the sum voted by the liberality of Parliament, and in 1871-2, after making provision for unexpected charges, a surplus remained over the money voted. With the exception, too, of a vote of £6,000 to be awarded to an officer, as the reward of a valuable invention, and for which the object was to get the sanction of Parliament, the Admiralty had not asked for Supplementary Votes. In the current year £50,000 more than had been estimated had been paid for coal, and there had been altogether an excess of about £90,000 for stores, but the aggregate of Vote 10 had not been exceeded. When we came to consider our contracts for building ships and buying machinery, under Vote 10, Section 2, which we should have entered into in July, we found the prices would be so exorbitant that we should not be justified in proceeding at once to make these contracts. We took the greatest pains to ascertain the probable course of the markets, and, having done so, we postponed our contracts a certain number of months. The result was, that we saved the country some £40,000 or £50,000 upon contracts which we were able to enter into at lower prices in the autumn. On the other hand, the Admiralty had been thrown back as regarded time, and, therefore, had not spent the whole of the money voted, fewer ships and engines falling within the year 1872-3 than had been anticipated. Now, he trusted the Committee would think that in that they had not acted wrongly. It was surely better to postpone the purchase of machinery for some months, and not to spend the whole of their money in the year, than for the sake of taking that amount to purchase at a higher price at the expense of the taxpayers of the country. They must this year ask Parliament for so much more money in order to make up those arrears. As regarded machinery, not the slightest inconvenience would arise from that postponement, because they were well ahead with their machinery as compared with their ship-building, so that no ship would be delayed through the engines being ready somewhat later. A similar course has been pursued in reference to ships. They ordered them at a later date and at a cheaper price, and, in consequence, the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), and others who watched the Estimates closely, would see that our liability for shipbuilding on the 1st of April 1873-4 would be considerably greater than was anticipated. The noble Lord would also see that in the year they had taken a larger amount of money for ships built by contract. This year it was proposed to build 6,000 tons by contract, as compared with 3,600 tons last year, about 1,000 tons of this excess being due to being behind with the shipbuilding by contract in 1872 on account of the orders being given later. Besides, the dearer coal, iron, and other materials, they had also to face a certain amount left as a legacy from the past year, and he had already shown that any reduction could only come out of the Stores and Dockyard Votes. The question therefore arose, could they avoid taking a larger sum this year than last by reducing the number of ships which it was proposed to build. He had shown that a reduction of expenditure could only come out of stores and dockyards, and that this was impracticable, not only on account of higher prices, but of arrears to be made up from 1872-3. For some years past the Committee had been asked to build about 20,000 tons a-year, and it would not be right in times of exceptional dearth of materials to vote large sums for 20,000 tons of shipping, which is the amount he intended to propose, unless he could adduce reasons why this should be done. He had examined the statistics available at the Admiralty as far back as 1855, to ascertain the amount of ships they had built since that time. He found that 550 ships had been built, representing a tonnage of 550,000 tons. Of these 41 were line-of-battle ships, 50 ironclads, 34 frigates, 26 corvettes, 40 sloops, 90 gun vessels, and nearly 200 gun-boats. Nevertheless, and he said it with regret, we must continue to build. For how many ships of how many tons did the Committee suppose had been struck off the effective list of the Navy in the same time? Ships to the extent of no less than 400,000 tons have been struck off. During eight years after 1855 76,000 tons out of 182,000 were struck off; and, worse than that, out of 314,000 tons, launched between 1855 and 1863, 98,000 tons, representing 124 ships, had vanished before the eight years were completed. Some had been lost, others had become obsolete, others had perished from wear and tear. He would lay on the Table a paper showing the causes of this. He would now offer some accurate figures respecting the last 10 years, showing the ships added to the Navy, what amount had been removed, and, above all, in what classes the changes had occurred, so as to indicate what our policy should be as to the ships to be built. During the last 10 years 148 seagoing ships, with 226,000 tonnage, had been launched, exclusive of 20,000 tons for Indian troopships, and exclusive also of tugs and non-seagoing ships. During that time 215,000 tons had been built—this figure of course not entirely agreeing with the tonnage launched. The tonnage struck off the effective list had practically been of the same amount, about 215,000 tons, comprised in 225 ships, thus showing a diminution in the number of ships of 77. On the 1st of January, 1863, there were 329 ships on the effective list, with 397,000 tons, while in 1873 there were 252 ships, with 402,000 tons. Some of the ships, as he had said, had become obsolete, and that accounted for a considerable number, and the reason why others had so quickly vanished was that, being originally built for a certain purpose, they had been converted to another. Ships not strong enough to hold the powerful engines put into them had been turned into screw steamers, and they had not been able to bear the wear and tear of engines. Many ships had been lengthened, and the lines had been fined down so much that they had proved unable to bear the very great horsepower put into them. No doubt some mistakes had been made, but in order to place a certain number of vessels at the disposal of the country in the short time necessary, wooden vessels had had to be made available. It was hoped, however, that the wear and tear in iron ships would be very considerably diminished. He would now state in what classes of ships the 215,000 tons had vanished from the list. Out of the 220,000 tons built, 148,000 were put into iron-clads, whereas of the ships that had been removed only one was an ironclad and 18 were line-of-battle ships. These together amounted to 56,000 tons.

Deducting the amount put into iron-clads and the amount lost through line-of-battle ships becoming obsolete, he arrived at the following figures:—206 vessels which were not iron-clad and were not fighting ships had been removed from the Navy, with 162,000 tons, and only 105 had been added with 76,000 tons. During the last 10 years 148,000 tons—a very large proportion of the total built—had been put into iron-clads, and 76,000 tons only had been distributed over other ships. Meanwhile the wear and tear which had been going on in our wooden ships had had these results:—206 had been removed from the effective list; of frigates we had lost 22 and added 2. We had 41; we now possessed 21. Of corvettes we had lost 12 and added 9. We had 26; we now possessed 23. Of sloops we had lost 37 and added 14, so that, having had 56, we now had 33. We had lost 68 gunboats and added 31; we had 81 and now had 44. Of gun vessels we had lost 36 and added 38; we had 41 and now we have 43. It would be seen therefore that the country had occupied itself during the last 10 years with the iron-clad Navy, which it was necessary to create, and that in all other classes of ships there had been a great reduction in number. Consequently, during the last few years, Parliament had been asked to vote certain sums in respect of the unarmoured Fleet. He had seen it stated, in those criticisms which every Administration must expect, that the Government had been frittering away money upon ships which would not give us any actual increase of fighting force. He had only to say in reply that if we were to keep up our squadrons on distant stations we must have ships to relieve them; and for that reason, though the Government did not propose to bring up the unarmoured ships to the old numbers, the necessary reliefs must be provided. He would remind the Committee of what had been done. Last year and the year before the the unarmoured fleet had received considerable additions. In 1871-72 we began the Amethyst, the Encounter, and the Modeste, three corvettes. We had made progress with the Coquette and the Kestrel class of gun-boats. We had also begun a large corvette and six sloops; and he was sorry to say they had been obliged to spend a portion of the money on troop ships and tugs

—a most necessary but uninteresting class of vessels. The programme of the Admiralty this year was, in round numbers, 14,000 tons of unarmoured ships and 6,000 tons of iron-clads. The 14,000 tons would be distributed in ships which he would specify later on. —[Lord HENRY LENNOX: What is the total amount of tons?— The programme of the present year gave a total of 20,000 tons—unarmoured 13,800, and armoured about 6,100. Considering the rapid diminution in the number of unarmoured vessels, he should not think it consistent with his duty to recommend less than the construction of 13,800 tons, in order to carry on the necessary services. He would now, however, address himself to the subject of iron-clads. There again hon. Members might say—"the price of iron is very high, and as contracts for iron plates must be made at a very unfavourable moment, would it not be sufficient to continue building the ships to which you stand committed, and not lay down any new iron-clads this year?" After examining the matter with the greatest care, he had arrived at the conclusion that he could not conscientiously recommend the Committee to build a smaller amount of iron-clads than he proposed. At the same time, he deprecated in the strongest terms any exaggeration or panic as to the state of our iron-clad Navy. He had read with much regret a good deal which had been said upon this subject. Occasionally he had been charged with having boasted of the state of our iron-clad Navy. Now, he had done nothing of the kind, though he had certainly defended it when attacked. Every one who had watched the naval discussions of the last six months would observe the curious modes of comparison continually adopted in contrasting our Navy with that of other countries. Last year, when he compared our ships with the French ships in some respects, the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) seemed to think it wrong to institute such a comparison. Certainly some correspondence in the newspapers, and in some important Reviews, had not followed that suggestion, and there had been a very rigid handicapping and contrast. Ministers, however, were not at liberty to make the comparisons which were free to those out of office, and therefore it was impossible for him in this House to speak a Quarterly article in reply, and he must confine himself to such things as were incidental to the arguments he was then advancing. When, however, he sought to persuade the Committee to build these 6,000 tons of iron-clads, it must not be supposed that there was such an inequality in our Navy, compared with those of other countries, as to produce any feeling of alarm. But he would give a specimen of the mode of comparison often instituted. In comparing our Navy with that of Russia, for example, it was said that naval superiority did not consist in the number of ships, but in their quality, and that any Power possessing one ship of extraordinary strength would be able to exercise enormous influence in maritime warfare. Then it was added that Russia possessed in the Peter the Great a ship superior to any of ours. It was supposed that the Peter the Great was ready, whereas the armour-plates of that vessel were at this moment being manufactured in Sheffield. Whether the vessel would be ready in one or two years' time he did not know; but what he might term the scare about the Peter the Great arose from the idea that a single vessel of extraordinary power would be sufficient to lame the maritime ascendancy of any other country. It was forgotten that we had almost completed the Devastation and the Thunderer, which might have thinner armour by two inches in some parts than the Peter the Great, but together would have twice the number of guns; while each would be almost a match for the Russian ship. He thought few sailors would not be glad of the opportunity of tackling it with two ships of that class, which, together, would be infinitely more powerful than the Peter the Great. The argument he referred to was therefore met by the fact that we had two ships instead of one. But he should like to know why this argument was only applied as between England and Russia? When England was compared with France, a perfectly different test was applied. Then attention was directed not to the strength of single ships, but to numbers, and lists were made in which our ships with 12 inches of iron were pitted against ships with eight. He had stated before, and he now desired to repeat the statement, that we had 12 ships which were so strong that all the other maritime countries together could not name 12 ships of equal strength. The ships that he referred to were the Devastation, the Thunderer, the Monarch, the Sultan, the Hercules, the Hotspur, the Audacious, and her five sister ships. What he contended was this—that with respect to our iron-clads we were so strong that, though we could not altogether suspend shipbuilding, we could afford to proceed with judgment and calmness, and, above all, to avoid the fatal mistake of coming to a decision too soon. It had been urged that the Admiralty had wasted two years' time; that we had not made the progress with iron-clads which we ought to have made; but it would be difficult to tell what ships we should have ordered. Certainly not such good ships as we should be able to order now, with all the knowledge and experience we had gained. They had already been charged with laying down, in the case of the Superb, a class of ships which was out of date before her keel was laid; and that charge, if true, was in itself sufficient to show that they ought not to proceed too hastily. It ought to be remembered that it was not English ships only which were out of date. That was not a test for the English Navy only but for foreign Navies. He did not regret that the building of iron-clad ships had been deferred. Now he had no doubt that defects were frequently exaggerated with a view to spurring the Admiralty to fresh exertion; but, as those statements were read abroad, and by foreign statesmen, he thought they were sometimes carried too far. There was another point to which he wished to call attention, on which the public were somewhat misled. We proceeded in this country on a somewhat different footing from what they did in France as regarded the pace at which we build. The practice in France was to lay down a large number of ships at the same time, and to take a long time to finish them; whereas we laid down fewer ships, completed them sooner, and were thus able to avail ourselves of all the most recent improvements for further ships. The practice, however, gave the French a great advantage on paper, for when the French laid down a great number of ships and we only laid down two or three they appeared to have a great numerical majority, and that had over and over again appeared in the comparisons which had been made. Ships which were laid down in France, for instance, in 1865 and 1866, and were not yet completed, had figured ever since in comparisons which had for their object the proof of England's inferiority. There had been an enormous advance made in this country as compared with France. He entered into this matter with some reluctance because he had no desire to depreciate foreign countries, where, too, the comparisons were not made. One ship, for instance, commenced in France in 1865 had only been completed to the extent of 72 per cent on the 1st of January, 1872; and another, commenced in 1866, had only been finished to the extent of 60 per cent. Since 1866, however, we had commenced and finished 15 iron-clads, while France had in the same time only commenced two new ships, which were not yet finished. He would now come to the question of what iron-clads we ought to build. There was the necessity for coast defence, for great line-of-battle ships, such as were to fight the battles of the future, and for iron-clads for distant cruising and for foreign stations. With regard to ships for coast defence, we were never so strong as at the present moment, and, as our requirements were greater in other directions, he did not propose to add to those ships. During the last two years we had to a great extent concentrated our efforts upon that class of ship. Leaving out the Hotspur, the Devastation, and the Thunderer, we had completed the Glatton, the Cyclops, and three sister ships, and we had the Rupert almost completed. When he made that statement he did not confine himself to the action of any particular Board of Admiralty. We had also 18 or 20 gunboats carrying 18-ton guns, a class of vessel that would be of great service to us in case we ever had to defend our ports, and would, he believed, prove more efficient than floating batteries, with 4½ inches of armour. Looking, too, at the Monitors of foreign countries, of which a great deal had been said, very few had more than 4½ inches of iron, and it would be found that they were totally inadequate to compete with these gunboats. In the programme of last year we included four gunboats of the Staunch class. Four vessels of this class had been laid down at Pembroke, but during the ensuing year their intention was to push on with the iron-clads in preference to these. He now approached the question of the type of iron-clads to be built. At present one might say there were three schools of naval architecture with regard to sea-going iron-clads. There were the advocates of masted turret ships, the advocates of unmasted turret ships, and the advocates of broadside iron-clads. He ought not, perhaps, to omit the school who were against building iron-clads at all, a school which thought that in the race of guns v. armour the guns would be so victorious as to make armour useless. Whatever might be the case with regard to the guns of the future, it would be evident that, as regarded existing ships of other countries, it would be impossible to meet them with unarmoured ships, and no country for many years would be able to encounter the armoured squadrons of other countries with unarmoured ships. Another set of opinions pointed to the conclusion that the vitals of the ship only should be protected leaving the unarmoured extremities to be protected by other means. Various suggestions had been made for securing the buoyancy of the extremities in action by other means than armour plating, and the Admiralty was engaged in testing the value of those suggestions. All, however, were agreed that the vitals of the ship should be protected. Differences of opinion also existed on the question as to what formed the vitals of a ship. Some held that the water-line was not vital, others that the batteries might be left unprotected; but all agreed that the parts surrounding the machinery were vital. The views of naval officers were very conflicting on the subject. Some said they would rather fight behind the unarmoured side of a ship than behind an armoured side. Captain Sherard Osborn, he believed, was one of those who would protect the batteries and leave the water-line to chance; but there seemed to be a growing opinion in favour of the presumption that the complete protection of the battery was not indispensable, but he would not go into that argument. Another point on which all were agreed was the impossibility of concentrating in one ship all the desired elements of security and speed, and inasmuch as a ship of a given size would carry only a certain weight, great thickness of iron could be employed in the construction of only parts of that ship, and must be dispensed with in other parts. Opinion was also unanimous in recommending thick armour wherever it was used, and dispensing with it altogether if it could not be used thick. The weight of opinion, in effect, was in favour of a foot of armour at the water-line and on the vitals of the ship, leaving the batteries unprotected, rather than 8 inches on the water-line and 6 on the batteries. Controversy still continued as to the merits of masted iron-clads, masted turret ships, unmasted turret ships, and broadside iron-clads. The number of those in favour of masted turret ships was declining, although one distinguished admiral was in favour of building 12 improved Monarchs straight off, notwithstanding they cost £500,000 each. Masted turret ships as hitherto designed had one great defect, they would not allow a perfect fire all round; bow or right-a-head fire, though considered by many as essential and positively decisive of naval actions in the future, was impossible with them. He did not propose, therefore, to build masted turret ships. Then as to ships of the Devastation class, he was in some dilemma as to the course he ought to take, having regard to the Notice which the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) had upon the Paper, because he did not wish to forestall that discussion.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he must leave the matter entirely to the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman, but he hoped that his views might not be prejudged, as he had given way to meet the convenience of the Government.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he proposed not to go into the discussion now, but his difficulty was that without saying something on the subject, he feared he could not complete his argument. He did not wish to assert any dogmatic opinion of his own, but he had consulted on this question with the most competent authorities. The point he wished to arrive at was this—we have had to ask ourselves which class of vessels we ought to prefer, the low freeboard turret-ships, which depend entirely on their engines, or vessels of the Sultan class, which are masted. He would tell the Committee the conclusion at which they had arrived, but he must first refer to the Devastation. There were three sources of danger to which vessels of the Devastation class were said to be subject. One regarded the stability of the ship, another regarded the liability to sink by water getting into her, and the third the danger of her being overwhelmed by the waves and unable to ride over a heavy sea. As to stability, the vanishing angle of stability of the ship as originally designed was  $43\frac{1}{2}$ ; the vanishing angle of stability at the measured mile with a draught of  $26\frac{1}{2}$  was  $55\frac{1}{2}$ , and the "Committee on Designs" were unanimously of opinion that whether with her superstructure as at present intended, or as originally designed, she could not be capsized under any circumstances which could occur. The Committee would recognize the great difference existing between masted ships and unmasted as regards stability. There was every reason to suppose that if the Captain had been an unmasted ship she would have been now afloat. But, as the Devastation was an unmasted ship, no one who knew anything of the matter would compare her with the Captain, or suppose that the dangers which she might have to encounter could be calculated from the disaster which had happened to that ill-fated vessel. However, it was because he believed that the fate of the one ship had some influence out-of-doors with regard to the other that he had taken the opportunity of pointing out that there was no analogy between them. But, besides being unmasted, and consequently not having the pressure of the wind upon her, the Devastation possessed a stability superior to that of the Captain, and that was another reason why the two ships should not be compared. The maximum angle of stability of the Devastation was 28 degrees, the maximum angle of stability of the Captain was 21 degrees. It would, therefore, be seen to how great an extent the proportion of the stability of the Devastation was superior to that of the Captain, though being unmasted she would not be exposed to the same danger at sea. It was wrong, in one sense, for him to make any comparison between the two vessels; but he did so knowing the conversations which had been held with regard to them. He should abstain at the present time from stating the difference in the stability of the ship which had arisen from additional superstructure, as he did not wish to raise any controversial point; but that was a matter with which he should be prepared to deal on a future occasion. He might, however, state his own opinion frankly that the question of the stability of the Devastation was one upon which few persons entertained any doubt, and therefore the dangers which were to be apprehended were of a different class. The second supposed source of danger was that there was so little of the ship out of the water that she was in danger of being overwhelmed. And here he would give some particulars of the buoyancy of the sister ship, the Thunderer. That vessel arrived yesterday morning at Portsmouth from Pembroke. As she passed the Lizard there was a considerable sea on, such as would be produced in the Channel with an east wind, and the force of the wind during a portion of the time was from 7 to 8. The Thunderer behaved, under the circumstances, remarkably well, and showed great buoyancy. He did not wish to lay too much stress on this point, because the vessel had not all her weights, but so far as the experiment went it was very satisfactory. If he could make out—as he certainly could—a fair case for the Devastation, he was sure everybody would rejoice, because there was not the slightest wish felt by anyone, in-doors or out-of-doors, to depreciate the vessel as one of our fighting ships. [Sir JOHN HAY: What is her speed?] That was a most interesting point, because the great danger apprehended was that the Thunderer and the Devastation would not be able to proceed at the highest speed against a head sea. If that were so it would destroy a great part of their value. Upon that point he had heard many officers speak with the greatest confidence. They said that it would be a loss of power if the Devastation could not steam against a head sea very rapidly, but they added that this defect could be overcome by seamanship, and that she would still remain a valuable ship. Well, on Saturday there was, as he had said, a considerable sea, which was right a-head of the Thunderer. When she was steaming against that head sea she was accompanied by the Valorous. The Valorous, though steaming full power, which ought to be 10 knots, went but five, while the Thunderer went at 12 knots without steaming full power. She ran away for two or three hours from the Valorous. That was an important circumstance, as far as it went. The captain of the Devastation and Admiral Stewart, Controller of the Navy, were on board; he had seen Admiral Stewart to-day, and he expressed the greatest satisfaction at the manner in which the ship performed her voyage under the circumstances. It would be satisfactory to the Committee and to the public out-of-doors to know that that was the case; and, of course, the Committee would understand that the Thunderer and Devastation being sister ships, it was allowable to argue from the one to the other. Now, as regarded "overwhelming," that was just the danger which had always been predicted in the case of the American monitors. One of these monitors foundered, and why? Because the water got into her from above. But what was the difference between the Devastation and the American monitors both with regard to freeboard and, what was more important in this connection, the height at which the water would be able to get into the ship? In the early American monitors there were openings in their lower decks, through which it was possible for a sea breaking over to find its way in. But in the Devastation there would not be a single opening into the interior of the ship at a less height than 24½ feet above the water. So far as the water getting into her was in question, he believed that every possible precaution had been taken that no possible means should exist by which such a danger could arise. He could not, of course, give an opinion upon such a question on his own authority; but he was distinctly informed by scientific men that a ship of that kind which was properly constructed would always rise again out of the waves passing over her, provided the water did not get into her, and that if the water was kept out she would float. As to her buoyancy and capability to resist being pressed down by a heavy sea breaking over her, that was one of the points which had most attracted the attention of naval officers. He believed he was correct in stating that the danger apprehended was that of the water breaking on the ship and weighing her down. Upon that point the question was, what was the proportion of the ship out of water as compared with that under water? Was the reserved buoyancy of the ship out of water sufficient? In the American monitors, out of 1,620 tons displacement, there was free ship above water equivalent to 150 tons, or about one-twelfth; but in the case of Devastation the bulk of the ship out of water was one-third. The Devastation, in fact, differed from all those monitors in nearly every particular. There was another point connected with this which had to be considered—he meant the amount of freeboard of the Devastation. The average freeboard over the whole ship was 9 feet 6 inches, which was more than 1½ feet over the rule laid down by the Institute of Naval Architects as the minimum for ordinary sea-going passenger ships, and it was only a small portion of the Devastation which had so low a freeboard as 4 feet 6 inches. The Russian ship, Peter the Great, had a freeboard of 3 feet 7 inches only, and of course she would be exposed to the same dangers as those which it was alleged the Devastation would have to encounter. The area of the foreccastle of the Devastation, which was 8 feet 8 inches out of the water, was 17 per cent of the whole; that of the superstructure, which was 11 feet out of the water, was 67 per cent of the whole, and that of the after deck, which was 4 feet 6 inches, was only 16 per cent of the whole. Now, the point he wanted to show was that the low part of the ship was only 16 per cent of the whole, and it was a mistake to consider the Devastation, as in the ordinary sense of the word, a low freeboard ship at all. It was exceedingly difficult for him, being neither a naval architect nor a sailor, to put this question clearly before the Committee. But he could assure them that the subject had been examined with the greatest care and attention. Every one at the Admiralty, both Lords and Constructors, were fully impressed with the enormous importance of this subject, and they felt they must incur the responsibility which attached to them in that respect. It might be safer for their peace of mind if they did not hold language in accordance with their convictions; but they thought it better to take the responsibility of saying that they believed this ship would be supreme in time of war, rather than shrink in time of peace from making those costly and anxious experiments which every nation must be prepared to make in a matter of such extreme importance as this. As to the stability of the ship, he had put it to the Naval Constructors—"Would you sacrifice any of the fighting qualities of the ship in order to insure greater stability?" The answer was—"No; they had got a stability which exceeded by five degrees the stability which the Committee of Designs recommended as the stability which these ships should have, and they would not be prepared to make any sacrifice to insure greater stability." He repeated that this matter had been considered with the greatest possible anxiety, not only by the Admiralty, but by the Committee of Designs, composed of naval and scientific men. They had gone into the most careful calculations, and they came to this conclusion, which, of course, involved a certain amount of anxiety; but for the satisfaction of those who had doubts he would say this—that they would regard the Devastation as an experimental ship, they would treat her as an experimental ship, with the greatest caution, feeling their way gradually. They would not be anxious to prove her a success at once, and would run no risks on that account; but they hoped and believed—and he believed that every hon. Member of this Committee hoped—she would turn out what they expected—a very great success, both as a fighting ship in Channel and as a sea-going ship. That being their view of the Devastation—and concurring in the opinion of the Committee of Design, who the Committee would remember considered the Devastation to be the fighting ship of the future, they nevertheless proposed last year to build two broadside iron-clad ships. They could not start with an ideal as being the best and most powerful ship. Very much depended on the service a ship would be called upon to perform. That was not a scientific question; it became rather a matter of common sense. What was the service that the iron-clads belonging to England might be called on to perform, and what were the ships they would have to meet? It would be a wrong policy to build ideal ships of enormous strength and cost if other countries were building vessels so inferior that we could meet them with ships very short of the ideal. The common-sense view to take was this. What was the service which our iron-clad ships would have to perform, and what was the class of ships they would have to encounter? He thought it would be a dangerous course for the Admiralty to ask what was the best ship and then say they would abide by that ship. One service consisted in fighting the combined squadrons of the enemy on the coasts of this country, in European waters, and in such other localities where they were likely to be met with, and another service was distant cruising. He had seen statements, especially in the newspapers, that the Admiralty would find it hard to justify themselves if they continued to build any armoured ships except unmasted Turret Ships of the Devastation class. That view had likewise been taken by many eminent men, though he confessed it was a view which could not be conscientiously entertained at the Admiralty. It had been said, for example, that the Admiralty would find it difficult to justify their conduct in commencing the Superb and the Téméraire. They took authority to build those iron-clad ships from the House of Commons last year when they obtained an almost unanimous concurrence of opinion in favour of the decision at which they had arrived—namely, that they must build a certain number of masted Iron-clads as well as unmasted Turret Ships. But that opinion was not shared by the more advanced school of naval architects, because the former class of vessels were deficient in some respects, and of course no naval architect liked to produce a ship which was in any way defective, his object being to produce what he believed would turn out to be the best fighting ship. The Admiralty could, however, cite high authorities in favour of proceeding with masted iron-clads. For instance, Sir Spencer Robinson and Mr. Reed had repeatedly stated their opinion that we ought to have sea-going turret ships and also masted iron-clads. There might, indeed, be a division of opinion as to whether precedence ought to be given to one class or the other, but he could produce ample authority to show that the number of our masted iron-clads should not be allowed to be diminished. He might say with reference to the course taken by foreign countries, that while Russia was constructing unmasted ships, Prussia and France appeared to have come to a different conclusion. At the same time he believed that in regard to one of the new ships which was laid down in France it had not been decided whether she should be subsequently fitted with masts or not. He was convinced, however, that we should not be safe if we possessed unmasted turret ships alone, without a large force of masted iron-clads, as long foreign countries had vessels of the latter class. Circumstances might arise in which unmasted ships would prove less serviceable than masted ships. For example, if an unmasted iron-clad got beyond the reach of her coal supplies she would have to return, while a masted iron-clad might remain out and be master of the situation. Therefore, after much anxious thought, the Admiralty had come to the conclusion that we must attempt to be supreme in every class of iron-clad which was built by foreign countries. We must have ships of the Devastation class to fight the great battles wherever they might be expected, and we must also have ships of the class of the Superb and the Téméraire, with armour as thick as they could bear to go to distant stations, and which would not have to rely upon their steaming powers. It was on this account that the Admiralty proposed to build the Superb and the Téméraire. These were two first-class masted iron-clads with regard to which he would presently address a few remarks to the Committee. This year they proposed to commence two new ironclad ships. One of these would be a vessel of the Devastation class. She would be built at Pembroke Dockyard, and would raise the number of our vessels of the Devastation class to four. Here he might remark that, whatever might be the result as to the power of the Devastation to steam against a head sea, everyone must admit that four ships of that class would, under any circumstances, be an invaluable and almost a necessary addition to the naval force of this country. In the event of these ships answering the expectations of the Admiralty in every respect, he should hope to raise their number to six; but until their seagoing power had been amply proved by experience he should not ask the Committee to go beyond the number he had just indicated. We should, then, be in this position. We should have the Superb and the Téméraire building at Chatham, and the Fury and the new Fury building at Pembroke. With these vessels those two dockyards would be fairly full. [Lord HENRY LENNOX: How many new ironclads do you propose to lay down this year?] The Superb and the Téméraire at Chatham, the Fury which was not a new ship, and the new Fury at Pembroke, and with them those two dockyards would be full. It would not be attempted to build more than two of these ironclads in each of these yards. [Lord HENRY LENNOX: That is one new ironclad.] He (Mr. Goschen) said it was so, as regarded those two yards. They had transferred the Téméraire from Portsmouth, where she figured in the programme of last year, to Chatham, which yard had been chiefly accustomed to build broadside ships, whereas Portsmouth had been dealing with turret ships. He further proposed to lay down a new iron-clad at Portsmouth, and he intended her to be a seagoing ship, which could meet any weather. He hoped, however, to persuade the

Committee not to ask him to state to-day what the ship at Portsmouth would be. Of course, before the money was voted the Committee would be entitled to ask the question, and he should be happy to inform them. But he wished to point out that they had gained the greatest advantage by postponing a decision respecting new ships from one period to another. As to the new ship to be built at Portsmouth, she would not be commenced until late in the year, and he should be glad to learn the result of the experiments on the Devastation before proceeding further with that vessel, especially as he thought it would be necessary next year to build another ironclad by contract, which additional vessel would probably be ready earlier than the ship to be commenced at Portsmouth. Therefore he wished to be in a position ultimately to decide whether, if we were to have another Fury and Superb, the latter should be built by contract and the Fury at Portsmouth, or vice versa. At present he thought it would be better that the broadside ships should be built by contract, and that we should continue to avail ourselves of the experience of the Portsmouth officers for ships of the Devastation class. If he were asked which ought to be completed first, he would say the broadside ship, and not another Devastation beyond the four to which he had previously alluded. The naval architects and those who assisted them were engaged in developing further types of broadside ships. While the Gentlemen opposite were in office they strained every nerve to discover an ironclad which should be of not immoderate size, and yet efficient for the distant stations. It was not desirable to have the ships on distant stations larger than was necessary for the purpose to be performed. Consequently the hon. Gentlemen opposite, when in office began the Audacious class. They were very useful ships, with eight inches of armour, and capable of going to foreign stations. [Sir JOHN HAY: And capable of going through the Suez Canal?] Yes. It was extremely desirable that there should be some small ironclads capable of going through the Suez Canal, and into ports and regions where ships of heavy draught could not go. The French had ten ships of what was called the Alma class. They were small and not very powerful ships, but they were useful and efficient. With the exception of the Audacious class, we had no ships of that class, but we were anxious to improve the design, so as to be able to get small ironclads with very thick armour and powerful guns, but less in size than the Téméraire and the Superb. We wished to reserve at present the design of the new ironclad to be built at Portsmouth, in order that we might have further opportunities of studying the question. With regard to the Superb and Téméraire, he thought they had gained much by the delay that had taken place. The Superb was now a more powerful ship than she would have been if she had been laid down six months ago. The result of the trial of the Devastation had shown that her twin screw having been deeply immersed gave greater power, and that a certain quantity of coal would carry her further than had been expected. In the Superb they were now able to count upon calculation as to the consumption of coal, whereby room might be gained and utilized for the armour of the ship and an increase in her defensive power, it being possible to raise the size of her guns from 18 to 25 tons. The naval architects at the Admiralty had now produced a design which it was hoped would compete with any ship that had yet been completed. The Superb would have a bow-fire perfectly unprecedented. She would have twin screws; she would have three distinct batteries—one on the main deck with two 25-ton guns; one also on the main deck, amidships, with six 18-ton guns, three on each side; and one in the upper deck of four 18-ton guns. She would thus have a broadside fire of six guns on each side, one being of 25 tons, and the other five of 18 tons. Right ahead she would have a fire of two guns of 25 tons, and two of 18 tons, and right astern she would have a fire of two 18-ton guns, and would be protected by a foot of armour at the water-line. She would also have a water-tight bulkhead fore and aft, and would have two sets of engines perfectly independent of each other. If, therefore, by the explosion of a shell one engine were disabled, she would be able to use the other. The Téméraire would be 40 feet shorter than the Superb, and 1,000 tons smaller. She would have two batteries on the main deck, the foremost one of two 25-ton guns, and the aft one of four 18-ton guns; but while the arrangement of her main deck would resemble that of the Superb, it was proposed to introduce—for the first time, he believed—on her upper deck a barbette tower. Being open on the top, this barbette would not give the same protection as other towers; but, on the other hand, the advantage would be gained of a free range over the whole of the horizon, and the tower would be protected by 10-inch armour, while the men would be screened against musketry fire. Much attention would be excited by this barbette tower, which the French had adopted in nearly all their ships. There would be other opportunities of explaining these designs, and if he shrank from going into any further details, he trusted the character of the ships would not thereby be prejudiced. He might, however, say, without boasting, that as regarded the Superb, she was fully equal, and he thought superior, both in her armour and armament to any of the existing turret ships. As regarded the Téméraire, he fully believed she would prove a most formidable fighting ship. He now came to the torpedo ship, the Vesuvius. In the Estimates of last year a Vote was taken for this ship, and if it were said of this vessel also that the progress made had been but small, the Admiralty could reply that further experience had been gained, and that they had been able to improve upon the design originally proposed. The torpedo ship of last year was to have a speed of 10 knots, and to be of 500 to 600 tons. It was found that nearly the same speed could be got out of a smaller ship, and that there was an advantage in discharging the torpedo from a small and almost invisible vessel carrying noiseless engines. Such a vessel ought to be distinguished by great handiness and speed, and it was proposed to build a small ship of this character of about 240 tons with a submerged tube, in order to try an experiment with the Whitehead torpedoes. If the experiment were successful, the principle might be applied to ships already built and in the service. Having now exhausted the question of iron-clad ships, he would very briefly state what they proposed to do with regard to unarmoured ships; but, before describing it, he wished to say something about what had already occupied public attention, and which he had, no doubt, would be mentioned in the course of that discussion—namely, that of the delays in the dockyards, and the comparatively little progress that had been made there, with what had been put forward last year. The noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) told him last year that if he (Mr. Goschen) accomplished all that he laid down, he would be a conjuror. He had now frankly to admit that he was not a conjuror, and he had not succeeded in accomplishing his task. They were, no doubt, behind in their shipbuilding in not being able to employ so many by 1,000 men as they hoped to be able to do at the beginning of the year. Some of that delay was, no doubt, to be attributed to that result; but it was also to be attributed in part to the errors of calculation as to the state of advancement of the ships at a given date. The Admiralty had been informed at the end of 1871-2 that the Thunderer and the Devastation would be in a good state of advancement on the 1st of April, at the beginning of the financial year, and they anticipated in the Estimates that they should require about 100 men on each ship to finish them off. The result, he regretted to say, was that they had to employ 500 men on the Devastation alone from the beginning to the end of the year, and almost as many on the Thunderer. The reason of that was that the officers of the dockyards, from want of experience in regard to an entirely new type of ship, had not sufficiently appreciated the great and complicated details connected with work of that kind, and conducted their calculations according to their ordinary method, which had broken down in the case of two such ships as the Devastation and the Thunderer. Then he was also prepared to admit that it was doubtful whether the communication between the dockyards and the Admiralty had been sufficient with regard to the amount of work that had to be done; at any rate, it had not been sufficient to make officers of the dockyards parties to the programme that the Admiralty undertook to carry out, the calculations as to the number of men required having been made at the Admiralty and not at the dockyards. It had been his duty last year to propose the appointment of a new officer—the Surveyor of Dockyards—and now there was a distinct communication between the Admiralty and the dockyards, and every detail of their programme 1873-4 had been considered in strict concert with the master shipwrights and engineers of the yards. That programme had been framed on a different principle from that hitherto adopted. Not only did they state the number of men they were going to employ on shipbuilding, but also the number of men that would be employed on each ship under repair, and the amount of money to be spent upon her. They hoped that by carrying out the details of that programme in conjunction with the Plymouth and Chatham officers, to ensure accuracy in their Estimates on this subject, not for that year alone, but for years to come, so that they might avoid the vagueness that had belonged to former Estimates. During the year 1,700 men had been employed on iron-clads instead of 1,500 as contemplated; but the anticipated amount of work had not been accomplished. They had had further difficulties to contend with. The case of the Megara showed the necessity of taking precautionary measures with regard to iron ships that had not before appeared so indispensable in their dockyards. The indestructible nature of iron had been too much assumed, and too little attention had been given to the liability of corrosion going on in certain places—a number of them being inaccessible—in the older class of ships especially, such as the Megara. Though the examination of many such places as had been reached proved that no very serious mischief had been going on, they had ample cause to rejoice that they adopted that view. This kind of work, examining the bottoms of ships, opening out hidden places, and remedying defects in them, had involved a large amount of work that they did not anticipate, and that did not appear on the Estimates; but it was satisfactory to have such work done, and they hoped that no case like that of the Megara would ever occur again. As that class of work had taken away a number of men from other classes, they had not been able to build to so large an extent as they expected. Then they had come to the conclusion that, looking to the wear and tear of their finest and largest iron-clads, it was better, when their newest ships had gone through a certain amount of service that had tested their capacity, to keep them at home prepared for any emergency, and that older ships should be sent into their absent squadrons. Accordingly, they had withdrawn the Monarch from the Channel Squadron, not because she had run out of her commission, but because they thought that the class of ships to which she and the Hercules belonged should, after a thorough trial of their powers, be husbanded for time of war. These ships would be kept as perfectly ready for sea as if in the squadrons, but would not be wearing out their engines and boilers. A similar course had been pursued with our best corvettes, it being thought more prudent to withdraw the Inconstant, Active, and the Volage from the Flying Squadron, where there was much wear and tear, and vessels had to be prepared to take the place of vessels thus husbanded. To prepare these, much additional labour and money had to be expended during the past year. Other causes of expenditure were the changes which it had been found necessary to make in the armaments of ships from the increasing power of guns, the number of guns having been multiplied in some cases. An 18-ton gun would be substituted for the 12-ton gun in the firing bow of the Monarch, and the armament of several ships had been strengthened, owing to the increasing power of gunboats. The Flying Squadron had been twice, instead of once, on the hands of the Admiralty during the year, storms more fearful than for many years past having caused a great deal of wear and tear, though few disasters. It was disappointing, when a good many men were employed on building, to have a squadron come back with a number of defects to be made good. These were some of the causes why the estimated amount of work had not been attained. This year it was proposed to employ 650 more men in the dockyards, but not so many in shipbuilding. That, he regretted, but the repairs had been carefully looked into, and it was believed that to insure the carrying out of these an increased number of men was necessary. A further cause of increased expenditure, he might mention, was the necessity of replacing a number of boilers in our iron-clads that had run out their ordinary time of wear and tear. That matter gave the Admiralty some anxiety, not so much in regard to the state of the boilers as regarded the expense in the future. They found that boilers employed in the Navy did not last so long as they did in former days, and they had placed themselves in communication with several private firms, in order that they might compare notes with them as to the wear and tear of boilers in our ships. He was assured by competent judges that the wear and tear did not depend alone on the length of time during which boilers were in use, but that what particularly tried them in our men-of-war was the frequency with which steam had to be got up, and the changes that the boilers were constantly going through. The Admiralty had a question pending as regarded super-heaters, and their effect upon the durability of boilers. In the case of the Nymph, they found that the boilers had lasted only four years, those of the Daphne had lasted four years only, those of the Philomel only four years, and, in the case of another vessel, about seven years. In the year 1873-4, he was sorry to say, it would be necessary to deal with the boilers of six of our iron-clads, including the Defence, the Resistance, the Minotaur, the Black Prince, and the Lord Clyde. The last-named vessel would not have required attention in that respect so soon if the recent accident had not happened to her. It was on account of the urgency of those repairs that they were obliged to ask the Committee to sanction an increase of workmen. It had been stated that in the speech he made at Bristol, he said—“We had never less arrears of shipbuilding than we had now.” He did not say that. What he said was—“We have completed up to the present moment nearly all the ships that belong to the past, and we have few arrears as to ships that were laid down by our predecessors.” The position at this moment was that, besides 2,200 tons which they had to build on vessels on the point of completion, they had only two ships, the Fury and the Blonde, belonging to programmes prior to 1872-3. On these they would make progress to the amount of 2,600 tons in the year 1873-4. There were about 9,360 tons to be done on ships commenced in the year 1872-3, and they hoped to build 5,500 tons on ships to be commenced in 1873-4. The Admiralty proposed to build a new corvette at Devonport, and a new corvette at Sheerness, and to order a new corvette by contract, believing that corvettes formed the point on which they were numerically weakest. They proposed further to begin a large covered corvette at Chatham, but intended to devote their chief energies there to the Superb and the Téméraire. They propose to order six new gunboats by contract, but he did not bind himself to have them all of the Coquette class. He ought to have mentioned a change which they made in their programme for 1872-3. They had proposed to build a corvette at Devonport, but finding, from causes to which he had referred, that comparatively little progress had been made, they determined, in order not to lose time, and hoping to carry out the intention of Parliament, to build the ship by contract, instead of commencing her at Devonport. Accordingly the Rover, a ship of the Active class, had been commenced, and great progress would be made with her in the current year. The same thing had been done as regarded Chatham, and the Daring, instead of being built there, will be constructed by contract. He had now stated the important points connected with their programme, and he would not detain the Committee by summing them up in detail. They proposed to build during the year 20,000 tons, of which about 14,000 were to be spent on unarmoured ships, and 6,000 upon iron-clads, and of the total about 14,000 tons would be built in their own dockyards and about 6,000 tons by private contract. He trusted that he had made a good defence of their policy as regarded the policy of not hurrying on the building of iron-clads till they were perfectly satisfied with their designs, and that he had shown that they had pursued a policy both economical and efficient in withdrawing their most valuable ships from the constant wear and tear to which they were exposed. There was a total increase in the Vote for dockyards of £136,000. Of that sum, £44,000 was due to an increase in the numbers of labourers employed, and £9,000 to various small items, including £3,000 for metropolitan police. Deducting these two amounts from £136,000, there remained £83,000, which represented an increase which he proposed to make in the scale of wages in the dockyards. He was conscious that in proposing to increase these wages he was doing a very important act, because they had to deal as well with the "established" workmen in our dockyards, who had what he might call life contracts, as with the class called "hired" workmen. Each dockyard was divided into two great branches, the shipwrights' department, and what he might call the engineers' department.

The main portion of the shipwrights employed in our dockyards were "established"—that was to say, they worked at a fixed rate of wages and received a pension at the end of their service. On the other hand, the men in the engineers' department were engaged on the mercantile principle, and received wages according to the fluctuations in the market. He was bound, however, to say that it was much easier for a Government establishment to follow the fluctuations of wages when they were upwards than when they were downwards. There were two classes of unskilled labourers employed in the dockyards, established and hired. The wages of the former were in the year 1869 12s. per week; but although they had been engaged on life contracts at that rate various small additions had from time to time been made in their wages until in the past financial year they had received 14s. per week. In August last, however, owing to a variety of circumstances, their wages had been increased by 3d. per day bringing it up to 15s. 6d. at which point it now stood, an increase which would involve a cost of £12,000 per annum; also there had further been an increase in the wages of hired workmen other than unskilled labourers, entailing a further annual cost of £10,000, so that they started this year with an increase under these heads of £22,000. Then as regarded the engineers' department—the factory where the mercantile principle prevails—they were obliged to take £8,000 in addition to meet an increased scale of wages which they felt they were obliged to give. It would be seen, therefore, that the Admiralty had had to face the difficult question of an increase in the rate of wages; but he did not wish the impression to go forth in the yards that there was an intention to raise the wages of every man employed in them. The Admiralty intended to be guided in the matter by sound mercantile principles. He now came to the question what was to be done with the established unskilled labourers. Were they to be left at 15s. 6d. a-week? We have power to say that they shall continue to work at that rate, because they have life contracts with us. But looking to the matter as large employers of labour, looking at the equity of the case, and many other circumstances with which he need not detain the Committee, he was prepared to say that he considered it right and necessary to make an increase in their wages by 3*d.* per day, regarding that as a final settlement. With reference to the hired labourers, they proposed to raise their wages from 15*s.* to 16*s.* 6*d.*—not to give to every labourer that sum, but to place it in the power of the dockyard officers to raise the wages to that amount, so as to enable them to winnow the inferior men from the good men. He did not for a moment wish to deceive the Committee upon this point. Labourers could be obtained for 15*s.* per week, but the quality was not in all cases what could be desired, and he believed that this increase in the wages would result in greater economy to the public service. The increase to the labourers hired and established would absorb about £9,000. He would now come to the skilled workmen, with whom they had life contracts. Shipwrights now received 4*s.* 6*d.* per day, and he had to ask the sanction of the Committee to increase the wages of the established shipwrights by 6*d.* per day, and the wages of certain other classes of workmen by 3*d.* a-day. He fully admitted that this was a very serious increase, but he did not wish to take the slightest credit for proposing it. Nothing could be worse than for any Government to claim credit for raising the wages of those in its employ. Her Majesty's Ministers had never erred in the direction of attempting to purchase a popularity cheap to themselves, but most costly to the public, by being liberal with the money of the taxpayer. Therefore, he by no means wished that this increase in the labourers' wages employed in the dockyards should be regarded as a liberal measure on the part of the Government. It was a grave thing for an employer of labour to state publicly the grounds upon which he thought it right to raise the wages of his servants, and he trusted, therefore, that the Committee would not ask him to state in detail the grounds which had led him to propose this increase in the wages, although he could assure them that those grounds had been most anxiously considered by the Admiralty. He might, however, state that the shipwrights began with working in wood, but were now engaged in the construction of iron ships, a work in which greater skill was required, which was more destructive to their clothes, and in which a greater number of accidents occurred than in the construction of wooden vessels. But besides this the workmen who were formerly workers in wood, and who then compared their position with other workers in wood, were now workers in iron, and compared their position with that of other workers in iron, and workers in iron as a general rule were more highly paid than workers in wood. It should be understood that they did not propose to give that increase in consequence of the high prices of commodities generally; and he ought to add that they thought it was better that that addition should be made to the wages of those workmen without Parliamentary pressure, than that Members of Parliament should be induced to interfere upon this point between the Government and their employés. No doubt 6*d.* a-day was a large increase, but they thought it was better that the measure they adopted on the subject should be thorough and final, and that no expectations of a further rise should be entertained. This increase in the wages of skilled labour would entail an additional annual expenditure of £44,000. The Estimate for the present year under this head would be in excess of that of former years by the sum of £136,000, part of which as he had shown was due to the rise in the wages, and part to the increase in the number of men employed. He should be compelled to defer stating to the Committee what had been done with regard to torpedoes. The Estimate for the Store Vote was £130,000 in excess of that of last year. There was an increase in the amount taken for timber of about £50,000, partly due to dearer prices, partly to the fact of more wooden ships being built. The increase in the price of coal had swollen the Estimates by the sum of £60,000, and in that of metal articles by £30,000 or £40,000. He would not enter into particulars with regard to the Vote for engines and machinery and for ships building by contract; but he would state generally that the increase in the Estimates due to dearer stores, dearer engines, dearer iron, and higher wages, amounted to £390,000, which would more than account for the total increase in the Estimates over those of last year. With regard to the personnel of the Navy, he should confine himself to stating that it was only proposed to diminish the numbers to be voted by 500 boys, which would in no way injure the fighting force of the service. He had explained his reasons in the commencement of his speech. He wished also to mention that a new retirement scheme for paymasters would reduce that class of officers from 240 to 200, and of assistant paymasters from 350 to 230, but there would be an increase of 50 writers. The Committee would, he thought, concur with him in the opinion that whenever it was possible to substitute fighting for non-fighting men in a ship the change was likely to be productive of great advantage. The reduction in the Navy Estimates due to the cause which he had just mentioned was £18,000 a-year, and the reduction had been effected by means of the adoption of a better system of ships' books. He might add that during the year an efficient and painstaking inquiry had been made into the system of accounts in the Navy, which had been undertaken with great public spirit by Messrs. Turquand and Young, who gave their services gratuitously. These gentlemen having gone through the accounts in conjunction with the Financial Secretary of the Admiralty and the Accountant-General, pronounced the system on the whole satisfactory, although they specified certain alterations which it might be desirable to make. For his part he thought the Committee would consider that the thanks of Parliament were due to Messrs. Turquand and Young for the valuable services they had thus rendered. As to the corps of Royal Marines, he wished to take that opportunity of saying that he had never regarded them otherwise than as a most important and valuable force, and one with which it would be unwise to tamper. He begged, therefore most emphatically to state that he had no ulterior design with regard to the corps, so that the idea that a reduction or change in the nature of the corps was about to be made might at once be dispelled. The Marines were all trained to the service of guns, and they were ready on any emergency to man our ships and fight our guns with the utmost efficiency, while they could be recruited in the same way as soldiers. He would not deal that evening with the question of the Royal Naval Reserve nor with the Volunteer movement, which he was glad to see had been extended to the Navy. When his hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr.

Brassey) brought forward his motion on the subject of our Reserves, he (Mr. Goschen) would be prepared to make a statement with regard to that Volunteer movement. In conclusion, he wished to say a few words with regard to the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, which had been started since the close of last Session and under the most favourable auspices. He had been so fortunate as to secure the services as President of Admiral Cooper Key, and he could not speak in terms of sufficient praise of the way in which that gallant officer had thrown himself heart and soul into the work. It had also secured the services of men of very high standing as Professors, and he thought it a great point that by means of the College a connecting link was made between the scientific world and the Navy, and that a scientific spirit would be developed there which would greatly assist in the solution of many of the problems which the authorities at the Admiralty now had to solve. He hoped by every possible inducement to get naval officers to go there, not by taking them away from their naval duties, but by enabling them to spend there with advantage the interval during which they were obliged to remain on shore. He might add, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), that an addition had been made to the half-pay of officers below the rank of captain who went to study at Greenwich. He merely wished to add that every effort had been used by the Admiralty to obtain the best assistance in solving the difficult problems with which they had to deal. They had upon their hands more scientific controversies than any other department, and he would conclude by expressing a hope that those controversies would not be increased by others of a party character. The right hon. Gentleman moved a Resolution to the effect that 60,000 men and boys be voted for the Naval and Coastguard service, for the year, including 14,000 for the Royal Marines.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he had, under any circumstances, intended to appeal to the indulgence of the Committee while he made some observations on the statements which had that night proceeded from the First Lord of the Admiralty. He stood there with one absent from his side, who, as his Friend had kindly guided him in his acquisition of a knowledge of naval matters. He felt his Friend's (Mr. Corry's) loss, and he felt his absence, and as such he appealed to the indulgence of the Committee. And how much more did he feel it when he was called on to-night in a somewhat responsible position to answer the speech of a Minister of the Crown which lasted for three hours and a-half. He listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with great advantage to himself and with deep interest; but he was sure that the Committee would feel that he was under disadvantages in having to reply to so high an authority. He intended to preface his statement by the fact that the Committee had at length arrived at the days when they were called on to examine and to criticize increased Estimates, and it had been his intention to state at the outset that it was not on the ground of increased expenditure that he ventured to think those Estimates were most unsatisfactory, but because he believed that those Estimates would not promote or secure the efficiency of the Navy. He had thought that no Englishman who listened to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) last year on the splendid duties which our Navy was called on to perform all over the globe would think those duties were uncalled for; but comparing the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman to-night with the performances which had since occurred, he (Lord Henry Lennox) was by no means confident that the Estimates now before the House would meet the difficulty. With regard to the dockyards, he was the last person to court popularity. He approved cordially of the increase of wages in the dockyards, but he declined to pledge himself to approve of the details of the increase, because he could scarcely follow what they were. He trusted they would promote contentment among men who in an age of strikes and combinations had remained faithful to the Government, and had not allied themselves with any of those movements. It was very seldom that he agreed with anything proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers), but he did concur with a part of the statement that he made in 1869, when he moved the Navy Estimates. He said that he came down to that House not only with the Estimates but also with a definite policy, one that he believed would recommend itself to the House of Commons and to the country. He (Lord Henry Lennox) thought that any great increase or decrease of expenditure should be based upon a definite policy which should be announced to the House; but he was sorry to say that so far as he could follow the speech they had just heard, no definite policy was laid down upon which to place the proposed increase of expenditure. He thought that the want of policy which had existed for the last four years with regard to naval affairs had been productive of the greatest possible mischief. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had several definite policies, but they had almost all been abandoned by his successor and Colleague upon the Treasury Bench. The right hon. Member was for giving up building wooden ships and confining ourselves to iron ones; but now the Committee were asked for a large increase in the Vote for the purchase of timber for the construction of a large number of these vessels. He also advocated ships of the Devastation class, a proposal opposed by Mr. Corry and his hon. and gallant Friend beside him (Sir John Hay), who divided the Committee against it. But he (Lord Henry Lennox) divided against those hon. Friends with whom he generally acted upon that question, because the First Lord upon that occasion said that he had most anxiously and carefully considered the question, and therefore he (Lord Henry Lennox) declined the responsibility of voting against the Estimate. The main reason of the long delay in constructing these vessels, as to which the Government had satisfied themselves so thoroughly, was that they had been relegated to the mercies of a Committee of 16. He believed the time had come when they should review calmly and carefully the naval policy of the last four or five years, and the expenditure which it had entailed upon the country; and, to show that he had no personal or party views, he would start with the Estimates of 1868, for which he was partly responsible, and which were declared "redundant and bloated" by hon. Gentlemen opposite at the General Election in that year who advocated national economy. The right hon. Member for Pontefract, on acceding to office, certainly redeemed his pledges, for in 1870 he made the wholesale reduction of £1,046,000, and in 1871 a smaller reduction. Since the present First Lord of the Admiralty had been in office the Votes in which the main reductions of his predecessor (Mr. Childers) were made had constantly, yearly and gradually, increased, until they had in some instances greatly exceeded the "redundant and bloated Estimates" of the Conservative Government, and in others closely approached them. No one, he was sure, would more readily endorse the statement that the Estimates he (Lord Henry Lennox) found were for an exceptional purpose than would the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract. Indeed, he had frankly stated that reductions would have been proposed had the official life of the late Government been spared. He observed by Vote 1 that the total number of men borne this year on the Navy was 60,000, as against 64,000 the first year the right hon. Member for Pontefract was in office, and as against 67,000 the year the late Government were in office. He did not object to that diminution in the force of the fleet if the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord was convinced that he had a sufficient number of blue-jackets for the proper manning of the Navy—enough in reserve in the event of an emergency arising for the manning of all the first class ships. The right hon. Gentleman had probably often heard in naval circles of the great advantage we experienced by having a redundant reserve when the difference occurred between our Government and that of the United States with respect to the seizure of the Trent, and by means of which the Duke of Somerset was enabled within 48 hours to man nine frigates and have them ready for service. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would state whether he considered 60,000 would be sufficient in the event of a sudden emergency arising. One of the reductions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) was in Vote 3—that for the Admiralty Office at Whitehall.—In 1868-9 that vote amounted in round numbers to £182,000; in 1869-70, the first year that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract was in office, to £168,000; in 1870-1, to £159,000; in 1871-2 to £163,000; in 1872-3 to £173,000, while in the present Estimate it amounted to within a trifle of £175,000. He would be the last person to grudge anything in the way of reasonable expenditure for the Admiralty Office at Whitehall. During the two years he had been associated with the gentlemen there he had, found them zealous in the discharge of their duties and honourable in their conduct. A set of men more anxious to do their duty to their Sovereign and to those in office, whatever might be their political opinions, it would be impossible to find, and he much regretted that an hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baxter) who once held a very influential position at the Admiralty, as he now did at the Treasury, should have thought fit to repeat a statement he had made reflecting seriously on the honour of Admiralty officials—a slight at which those gentlemen, if they did not resent it, felt deeply hurt. He would not go into the details on that occasion, but the Committee would see that there was a considerable increase also in the vote for the Controller's Office. He had heard nothing to alter the opinion he expressed last year that to appoint a council of seven to carry on the work of designing the ships of the Navy was a plan for frittering away responsibility, and not for improving naval administration. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract had taken great credit for the reduction he had effected in the Vote for Naval Stores, No. 10, for which, if he understood the First Lord of the Admiralty, the excess for the present year was £90,000. — [Mr. GOSCHEN: No; that was the amount for the year 1872-3.] He (Lord Henry Lennox) understood the right hon. Gentleman to have referred to the present Estimates. In the so-called exceptionally "redundant" Estimates of the Tory Government the Naval Store Vote amounted to £892,908. The following year the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract startled them all by announcing a reduction in the vote to £801,000, being a saving of upwards of £91,000. In the following year he followed that up by a further reduction of £22,488. But, like Vote 3, that Vote had since gone on increasing. He was told that the present increase was owing to the high price of coal, but he had taken the trouble to eliminate from the Estimate the expenditure under that head, and found that there was a saving on account of coal of £40,000 instead of an excess. In 1870-1 there was a decrease in the Store Vote of £22,488. In 1871-2 there was an increase of £58,800; in 1872-3, an increase of £90,545, while this year the Vote reached the enormous figure of £1,072,380, being £179,472 in excess of the sum asked for by the "extravagant" Government of which he had the honour to be a Member in 1868-9. There was a remarkable circumstance connected with the Store Vote, which tended to show the great sagacity and foresight of his lamented Friend Mr. Corry. In August, 1871, a question arose with respect to the Victualling Stores, when it was found that from the extraordinary abundance we had in the yards, we might send over a supply of biscuits to the besieged poor of Paris. His lamented Friend said that it was all very well to talk of the Victualling Stores, but what about the Naval Stores—the masts and timber—and that if the First Lord had to put in commission all the ships he ought to have done he would have to make a heavy purchase of stores which on a sudden emergency could not be purchased with advantage to the country. What proved to be the fact? The first year that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) held office there was a decrease in these items of £54,802. In the following year there was a further, but small decrease of £797. From that time the Vote had increased. In 1871-2 it was increased by £41,415; in 1872-3 by £86,734, and now it was proposed further to increase it by £44,808. Therefore, since his lamented Friend had given the warning as to the result which must follow from not having a sufficient supply of masts and timber, the vote had gone on increasing. He also observed that last year the First Lord made a remarkable statement with regard to this item. He said that he had effected a saving in the financial year on Section No. 2, and had expended the saving in increasing our stock of stores. The right hon. Gentleman took credit to himself because there was a saving on Section No. 2—in shipbuilding by contract—and that the saving had been expended in increasing our stock of stores, because the price of most articles had gone up. Now, it was very bad policy in the end to attenuate our stores, to the last degree. He considered it a most extraordinary subject of congratulation to find that there had been such a saving in ships built by contract. The First Lord asked for the ships that were necessary for the service, and nothing more, and if he could not have had them launched at that period it would have been anything but a source of congratulation. The next Vote to which he would refer was Vote 6, and here the First Lord had his most perfect sympathy. The right hon. Gentleman said "the noble Lord opposite (Lord Henry Lennox) will say that he warned me that if I were not a conjuror I could not fulfil the programme I had proposed." Now, he (Lord Henry Lennox) denied that statement, and would prove it from the right hon. Gentleman's own words. He told the right hon. Gentleman that repairs and refits governed the strength of the fleet, and that he would always find himself short in his shipbuilding—that if the Channel squadron came in for repairs the builders must be taken off the ship, however important the building might be. He told the right hon. Gentleman so for two year's running, and what did he now say? He was going to enter a large number of men in the dockyards in consequence of the necessity that existed to undertake the repairs of the fleet. He could quite understand why the right hon. Gentleman should glance lightly at that matter, and not give him (Lord Henry Lennox) the credit which was due to him for warning him from a policy which had not proved creditable to the administration. The right hon. Gentleman had made several allusions to letters and articles which had appeared in the newspapers, and more especially to a letter respecting a Russian ship, and entered into an elaborate statement on the subject. Now, he protested against having saddled upon him the statement that he was guilty of a want of patriotism in showing up the shortcomings in our dockyards. As to supposing that anything said here enlightened foreign Governments, the youngest hon. Member of the House would not for a moment credit the statement. The Vote to which he was referring had followed the same order as the Votes which he had mentioned. In 1868-9 it was £1,200,000; in 1869-70 £1,086,000; in 1870-1 it was reduced to £878,000; then in 1871-2 it rose to £967,000; in 1872-3, to £978,000; and in 1873-4 it stood at £1,115,000, or within £100,000 of those redundant Estimates—those “bloated” Tory Estimates of 1868-9 which moved the indignation of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. At that time it should be remembered, great efforts were necessary in order to bring up our iron-clad Navy to that of France; while now, provision was made for only one iron-clad, or possibly two, and two corvettes. And with that meagre programme the Committee were asked to vote within £100,000 of the Vote of 1868-9. He was somewhat taken aback by the elaborate argument of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Devastation, but he rejoiced to hear what had been said about the Thunderer, for he had never been an opponent of the mastless turret-ship. But as he had given way to the right hon. Gentleman, he might say, to use a nautical phrase, that the right hon. Gentleman had somewhat taken the wind out of his sails.

MR. GOSCHEN: I wished to act in all courtesy to the noble Lord, and purposely omitted all controverted points.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that on Thursday week he would mention some points connected with the Devastation, which he did not propose to do at present, and which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) had omitted to notice in his speech. He would now proceed to notice what had been done in our dockyards in the course of the year. In his remarks upon the dockyards he wished to cast no reflections upon the dockyard authorities or upon the Controller of the Navy, feeling sure that all that could be done would be done by that gallant officer. He also wished to say that in any criticisms which he might make on the Board of Admiralty, he did not wish to reflect any discredit on the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman. In order to see what had been done during the year, it was necessary to look at the promises which had been made, and he would limit his remarks to two heads—one, the ships that were built in 1872, when the Estimates were brought forward; the other, ships that were then building and to be completed during the year. The First Lord of the Admiralty had told him last year that he had proposed to build about 17,500 tons of shipping, though the Estimates stated 16,041 tons. [Mr. Goschen referred the noble Lord to the statement in Hansard.]

Lord Henry Lennox

Whether the amount were 17,500 tons or 16,041 tons it mattered little to his argument, so strong was his case. The right hon. Gentleman stated that it was the intention of the Government to finish that year every ship in hand, except the Fury and that with her it was designed to make as much progress as possible. How stood the case, then, with respect to the Superb, the Téméraire, the Bacchante, and the Boadicea? The right hon. Gentleman contemplated working some 5,000 tons into the Fury; he had, however, succeeded in adding only 200 tons. At the time the right hon. Gentleman made this promise, 24 ships had been begun, and the commencement of five others of a smaller class was contemplated. All these were to be finished in the year, but only 15 of them had been completed, and these 15 were of the smallest class. Not only so, but they were already nearly finished at the opening of the year, and unless the Estimates deceived him, their completion had cost £1,136,000. The Naval Estimates were drawn up in the most puzzling manner, and it was very difficult for him to be assured that he apprehended them rightly, though he had devoted much attention to them. The 14 ships remaining unfinished were powerful and important ships, and two of them, the Blonde and the Raleigh, were old friends. He believed that in the year 1871 the right hon. Gentleman told the House that the Blonde would be finished before April, 1872, up to half of her tonnage, and that the Raleigh would have only 650 tons to be built in on the 31st of March, 1872; but neither the Blonde nor Raleigh was yet finished on the 31st of March, 1873, nor was it probable they would be finished until the middle of next year. The comparison of the tonnage of the completed and uncompleted ships included in the right hon. Gentleman's promise was still more remarkable. The aggregate tonnage of the ships not completed was 24,973 tons; the aggregate tonnage of the ships that were finished was only 7,093 tons. He thought that was not a proper way of dealing with the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman had placed in the Navy Estimates of this year, besides the builders' measurement, the displacement in each of Her Majesty's ships. He hoped that before next year the right hon. Gentleman would find out a more satisfactory mode of assuring the completion of the ships under construction. Instead of the 16,500 tons that were promised, in fact, only 9649 tons were produced.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that some mistake had been made as to the progress to be made towards the completion of the ships. According to the ordinary method of calculating, 13,600 tons had been built during the year.

LORD HENRY LENNOX calculated there would be still 3,000 tons short of the promise even on that basis. The right hon Gentleman talked about a mistake; but having gone over the figures furnished in the Estimates, he had come each time to the conclusion he had stated. They had been told that certain progress was to be made with the Fury, but that promise had not been fulfilled. Nor was it clearly stated what was to be done.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was afraid he had made a mistake. Work was to be done upon six large and powerful iron-clads.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that these vessels were not new as regarded the House of Commons. They had been told that certain work was to be done upon certain ships, but it had not progressed as the House had been led to expect. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government were about to lay down another vessel of the Devastation class, though he could not state the details, nor would the House wish to press him upon that matter. The Roebeck was one of those which the right hon. Gentleman had said would be finished by March, 1873; he had stated last year that she required between 600 and 700 tons to be built into her, but although 968 tons had been added to her during the year, she still required 198 tons to complete her. This was one of the extraordinary blunders which characterised the calculations of the right hon. Gentleman. As far as he could understand the programme of the right hon. Gentleman for the coming year, he purposed going on with several first-class ships for which money had been voted in the year now closing. The money for the Fury was voted in 1869, and yet she had not been advanced. He sympathized with the right hon. Gentleman in having to make palatable Estimates for those who sat near him, when he knew how unpalatable they must be to those who understood the necessities of the case and cared for the efficiency of the service. He gave the right hon. Gentleman credit for his able and lucid speech, but disguise the matter as the right hon. Gentleman might, the bare fact remained of an increase of £340,000 on the current year; which had shown an increase on the year before, and this increased charge was accompanied by fewer men. Besides this, the ships in commission were 30 fewer than they were in 1868-9, and the dockyard programme was feeble in the extreme. Each year fewer ships were added to the Navy, and those which had been added by the right hon. Gentleman were laid down by his predecessors. There was another most important point to which he wished to refer before sitting down, and that was the question of the torpedo. The Admiralty in 1870 purchased Mr. Whitehead's torpedo patent, and last year the right hon. Gentleman asked for £17,800 for torpedo experiments. He would be glad to know where that £17,800 had disappeared. The right hon. Gentleman had over and over again justified his delay in building ships by stating that by that means he had been able to introduce various kinds of improvements which had been discovered in the mean time. But if that argument were good for anything, it would be an argument against building ships at all. The Admiralty bought the torpedo patent in 1870; the Committee was now discussing the Estimates of 1874, and we had not yet got a torpedo ship to try experiments upon. If the right hon. Gentleman's arguments were good for anything we might have to wait four or five years longer, and even then we should find that naval science and invention was not at an end. He (Lord Henry Lennox) was always ready to support any Estimates which would promote the efficiency of the Navy, but he could not sit there and give a silent vote in favour of an enormous expenditure which led to such small results.

MR. SAMUDA thought that the First Lord of the Admiralty must have derived great advantage from the change in the constitution of the Board; but while he expressed his satisfaction at the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he was in constant communication with his Board, and formed his judgments in every case in conjunction with the scientific branch of the Department, he had hoped to hear that a general and comprehensive policy was about to be entered upon; but he was very much disappointed to find that the Board had not yet decided on the type of the new ship about to be laid down, and feared they were about to return to a hand to mouth system. He had no idea until he heard it from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman himself that so strong a case existed for building ships. According to the right hon. Gentleman's statement, while during the last 10 years we built 224,000 tons we lost 215,000; and if we went back 18 years it would be seen that while we built at the rate of 30,000 tons a-year we did not after all appear to be making any progress in the number of our vessels. He apprehended there was some mistake with respect to the action of the two screws. He had never heard of the two screws being superior in their action to one screw.

MR. GOSCHEN explained that what he had meant was not that the double screw was better than the one screw, but that upon trial the double screw had given results which exceeded the anticipations that had been formed of it.

MR. SAMUDA regretted that our experiments with respect to the effects of the torpedo were so meagre. When he considered the importance of acquiring a knowledge of such weapons of offence, he must ask whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention had been directed to a little vessel which he had seen with astonishment and admiration in the neighbourhood of Chiswick. In the vessel to which he alluded such an extraordinary advance had been made in the use of the screw in vessels of the smallest size, and which could float in the shallowest water, that he could not help thinking the whole face of naval warfare might be changed by properly utilizing the invention. He was now speaking of a little craft built by Mr. Thorneycroft, son of the celebrated sculptor. The little vessel was not more than 53 feet long, and so light that it could be lifted with the greatest ease into the davits of a ship. He had travelled in the vessel on the Thames at the rate of 16 knots an hour, and yet the engine was so small as to be apparently incapable of such a result. One of those little vessels let down from the deck of the Devastation armed with a torpedo, under the fire and smoke generated in action, might produce an immense amount of destruction upon an enemy. Why, they might, at a stroke, destroy the enemy's vessel. Such a matter, which might be productive of enormous results, could not have too much attention turned to it. He believed that these vessels showed an improvement in the action of the screw which would be of greater advantage to steam navigation than even the introduction of the beautiful mechanical apparatus called the oscillating engine, over the beam engine it superseded some years ago. He was greatly surprised with the speed of these small vessels, which seemed to start with the rapidity of a rocket, but which could yet be brought to a full stop in half a length. Indeed, he felt convinced that the well-considered use of these vessels, when their capabilities had been well developed, and efficiently applied to assist in torpedo warfare, would have the effect of revolutionizing the whole of our arrangements of naval warfare.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he had listened with attention to the very able speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), and he could not help thinking there were omissions in it, which he regretted; but, before referring to these, he would say a few words on some of the points to which the First Lord of the Admiralty had adverted. The right hon. Gentleman had made a sort of apology for having too many ships; but he did not think that the House of Commons or the people of this country would find fault with him on that score. Nor did he consider it necessary to account for an increase in the Estimates owing to the high price of coal, iron, and other materials. It was perfectly obvious that the fact must be so. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose that exception might be taken to his Estimates, on the ground of their being excessive, by some hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House. But certainly hon. Gentlemen who did take such exception would not be actuated by a spirit of patriotism, and the right hon. Gentleman might rest assured that they would not have the feeling of the House or of the country with them. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the maximum angle of stability in the ill-fated Captain as being 21 degrees. But with such a maximum he (Mr. Bentinck) could only feel surprised that anyone should have taken upon himself the responsibility of sending the ship to sea, since it was obvious that she must go down under such circumstances. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman talk of the Devastation as an experimental ship, because it showed that the Admiralty had not made up their minds that that was to be the class of ship of which the British Navy was to be composed for the future. The Devastation never could be a seagoing ship. It was utterly impossible to make her fit for that purpose. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be in doubt as to the propriety of masting or not masting iron-clads; but the masts of nearly all our iron-clads were perfectly useless, and such vessels could be handled solely by steam. Speaking of the larger class of them, there was not one that could be handled as a sailing ship. He was sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that some new ships were to be built in private yards—a state of things that never ought to happen in time of peace. Our dockyards should be kept in a state of efficiency to meet not only all the requirements of the day, but of any emergency. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned as an excuse for the comparatively small amount of work done in the naval dockyards that all the arrangements of those yards had been upset by the bad weather having driven the flying squadron into port in a damaged condition. But surely the dockyards ought to be in such a condition that their arrangements could not be disturbed by a trifle of that kind. The right hon. Gentleman had not referred at all to the subject on which the efficiency of the Navy must really rest—he referred to the struggle between armour and guns. Had the right hon. Gentleman turned his mind to that subject? If so, would he state his opinion as to the power of the gun that ought to be used in armour-plated vessels? Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to state what he looked forward to as the future comparative position between armour-plating and guns? If he was not, he was not prepared to solve the great problem of the day; and if he had not considered the question, he was setting aside what, after all, was the most important question to be discussed. There was another point. The right hon. Gentleman had not gone into the great question as regards the Navy for the future. For his own part he maintained that for the future we must have two distinct classes of ships—one heavily armour-plated and armed for home defence, and one for seagoing purposes. There was not one of our iron-clads which could be fairly deemed a sea-going ship, and every ship for seagoing purposes should be entirely independent of coal, and should be able to be handled under canvas, and to play her part under canvas under any circumstances in which she could be placed. Again, they had been told that a certain number of ships of each class was kept in the First Reserve, and that these ships were ready for commission at any moment. Now, he wanted to know if it was the fact that these ships were actually ready for commission at any moment, because if his information were correct they were not ready, and they were incomplete in one or more of four points—in their hulls, in their rigging, in their engines, and in their armaments. We had plenty of seamen, but if the ships of the First Reserve in which they ought to be placed were not ready there was no use in having the men. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would give some explanation on this point. He had also been told that the rope supply was deficient in quantity, and was not of the best quality. If that were true there could not be a greater slur on the condition of our dockyards. Serious complaints had been made at home and abroad of the quality of the rope, and he had heard that the rope manufactured at Devonport dockyard had been condemned when received at Portsmouth. If that state of things existed it could only be attributed to that petty system of penny-wise economy which risked the loss of a ship for the sake of a £5 note. It was also said that the stores were not in such quantities as were required for the service. There was another question with regard to our first-class iron-clads. The Committee would remember the accident which occurred to the Northumberland when she parted her cable and went into another iron-clad. He wished to know how it came that a ship of that class should remain with a single anchor in the winter time without steam up ready for immediate use. He attributed it to that same wretched system of economy. He could not understand how it required an hour to get up steam unless there was some uncomfortable restriction as to the use of coal. He was informed that an alteration was made some time ago in order to fit chain cables to capstans which were already made, but, if this was true, he felt confident no sailor had sanctioned the arrangement, as it was known that such a process deteriorated the cables. Moreover, he was informed that the cables supplied to these enormous vessels were not of the largest size that could be manufactured, nor formed of the very best and strongest iron that could be obtained. There was a description of iron to be obtained of such a quality that cables made from it would scarcely part under any circumstances. He wanted to know why these heavy ships were not supplied with the largest and best iron chains that could be obtained. In conclusion, he traced these shortcomings to the practice of placing men of great abilities in positions for which they were not qualified. The misfortunes to which he had referred could not have happened if sailors, albeit men of possibly less ability than the right hon. Gentleman had had the control of the Department over which he presided, and he hoped the House of Commons would soon perceive the necessity of placing at the head of every great Public Department not only a man of ability but a man who thoroughly understood his business.

MR. RYLANDS said, that during the last 10 years £100,000,000 had been spent on the naval service of the country, involving a great amount of undue expenditure. There had not been of late years any desire to cut down the expenditure to a reasonable and proper amount. Large sums had been for some years expended on the Navy, for which the country did not receive sufficient benefit. The result of recent changes in naval construction had been to obtain more offensive and defensive power with a less number of guns and men. It would have been quite consistent with these changes if the First Lord had been able to dispense with a number of men, instead of coming down to the House with increased Estimates. It was clear from what the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Admiralty ought not to be too much hurried in the construction of vessels of war. There was not that absolute certainty at the present moment as to the best ship of the future which should lead the Admiralty to push forward the construction of new vessels; and, as there was no immediate prospect of war, he advised the Admiralty to pause before they proceeded with the construction of new ships, for he felt certain that in the meantime they would derive a still further advantage from delay.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, it was impossible to delay building ships until a time of war. It would be ridiculous to ask an enemy to delay his invasion until we had a sufficient number of ships to properly receive him. The new ships were very expensive; but it was the inevitable necessity of the case that living in an age of invention we had to incur a great penalty. It would be much less if we were more stupid; but being so very clever, we must pay for it. He begged to express his satisfaction at the announcement of the First Lord of the Admiralty of his intention to raise the wages of the men in the dockyards.

LORD HENRY SCOTT regretted that the First Lord of the Admiralty had taken a Vote for 500 boys less than that of last year. He wished to know if the average number had been kept up in the training ships, or if it had fallen off. He wished also to know if it was contemplated to take boys from the district of the ports where the training ships were stationed, because if that were done he believed they would obtain a better class of boys. He wished to know from the First Lord, whether it was the intention of the Admiralty to carry out the recommendation of the Committee on Designs, as contained in a Report they had prepared with reference to increasing the class of vessels to which the Cyclops and the Glatton belonged. In that Report the Committee stated, not that these vessels were fit to go to sea in bad weather, but that they were fit to cross from port to port in favourable weather only.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, in answer to various questions which had been put during the course of the evening, said, that with respect to the boys for the training ships, the number, it was true, had sometimes been less than the number intended; but the aggregate number of boys afloat in the training ships had been fully equal to the number voted. The Admiralty were, however, anxious to make more generally known the advantages conferred by the service, and with that object a recruiting party had been formed for the purpose of spreading the information in the country districts. A plan with a view to carry out the experiments recommended by the Committee of Designs was under consideration, and would, he believed, shortly be completed. With reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck), with regard to chain cables and ropes, the Admiralty were always anxious that the best articles which could be procured should be supplied. It was the first time that they had heard anything of the story told by the hon. Member, and he, for one, had not the slightest belief in its accuracy. In any case, it was to be regretted that those who had primed the hon. Gentleman with that story had not first of all referred to the Admiralty, so that an inquiry might have been instituted. The Admiralty were equally anxious that none but the best ropes should be supplied to the service, and the machinery employed at Plymouth in its production had with that object been improved. And he might say that a quantity of well-seasoned yarn was always kept in hand, so that it might be used in proper quantities in the manufacture of rope for the Navy. He regretted that the lateness of the hour would not enable him to reply at greater length to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester, who so ably represented the late Mr. Corry, whose loss they all deplored. In the complaints made by the noble Lord, he appeared altogether to have lost sight of the fact that there had recently been a great rise in the price of iron, copper, coal, and other materials, and of all articles required in the service, and at the same time a considerable advance in wages; these two circumstances involving this year an increase of £390,000 upon the expenditure of former years. The noble Lord had stated that the Store Vote had nearly reached the point at which it stood during the "bloated armaments" of a Tory Government, and though he felt no disposition to quarrel with the phrase, he desired to point out to the noble Lord that, in spite of the increase in cost of materials and wages, the Votes were £1,300,000 below the amount voted in 1868-9. [Lord HENRY LENNOX explained that he had referred to the Store Vote alone, which was in excess of the Store Vote for 1868-9.] That was true; but the noble Lord had forgotten or had ignored the increase which had arisen in the cost of materials. For instance, iron, which in April, 1871, cost a little over £7 a ton, had on the 1st of July last reached £13 a ton, and cost now over £13 a ton. Coal and copper, in the same way, had risen considerably in value. The Admiralty had found it expedient to make arrangements for supplying ships at foreign stations with foreign coals. Coals supplied to foreign stations from the immediate neighbourhood cost less by a third than coal supplied from England. He admitted that coal supplied from Australia, for instance, was not quite equal to the best Welsh coal; but no complaint had reached the Admiralty from our cruisers in Australia with regard to the coal supplied to them. Coal from Nova Scotia reached Bermuda in seven or eight days, but coal from England could not reach Bermuda before the lapse of five or six weeks. It was a matter of the utmost importance that vessels at foreign stations should be supplied with coal at the earliest period. With regard to the timber Vote, to which the noble Lord had adverted, he wished to remind the Committee that in 1867-8 the stock of timber in the dockyards was valued at £1,500,000. It was now valued at about £500,000, and the unwisdom of keeping a large stock of timber was shown by the fact that it depreciated in value about £50,000 a-year. Though there was an increase of £40,000 in the Vote this year—one-half of which was due to increase of price—they only proposed to purchase the normal amount of timber for the dockyards. The noble Lord stated that Vote 3 this year was larger than the amount which was proposed by his Board—[Lord HENRY LENNOX: I said it was nearest in amount]—but if the noble Lord had made the proper comparison, and included the Coastguard Vote, which was then included but now separated from this Vote, he would have found that there was a reduction of £16,000. Then on Vote 6 he would find there was expended, 1867-8, £1,424,000, whereas they asked for 1873-4, £1,115,000, of which sum £83,000 was due to increase of wages. He thought the noble Lord would approve of the policy of completing the vessels which they had begun, rather than laying down a large number of new iron-clads.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty had raised a number of points which could not be discussed that night. He should not object to the first two Votes being taken that night if it were distinctly understood that Vote 3 should be discussed on a subsequent occasion.

MR. GOSCHEN believed that all the more important questions which had been raised to night could be discussed on Vote 6. He would take that Vote on the first opportunity which presented itself, because he was anxious that the question of the wages of the artificers in the dockyards should be settled as soon as possible. He did not think the discussion could be taken on Vote 3.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not referred to the remarks of his noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox) on the subject of the number of men and of the reserve. He thought that that question should be discussed at a more convenient time.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the noble Lord had asked if they had got sufficient men to man all their first-class Reserve. They had more men than would be sufficient; and in fact, a larger number than he liked.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE repeated that if the Votes for the number of men and for the victualling of the Navy were agreed to, it ought to be on the understanding that the discussion might be renewed on a future occasion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON thought that the application of the hon. Baronet was a fair and reasonable one, considering the length of time the right hon. Gentleman had occupied in his opening statement and the present late hour of the night, ten minutes to 1 o'clock.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that every facility would be given for the discussion consistently with the forms of the House.

SUPPLY—TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

EXPLANATION.

Resolutions [March 21st] reported.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH took the opportunity of correcting a mis-statement made the other night by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) respecting the expenditure of money by the Telegraph Department. The hon. Member had on the occasion to which he referred used expressions disparaging to the Audit Office. He thought it necessary, under these circumstances, to state, on the part of the Committee on Public Accounts, that they were not only satisfied, but more than satisfied, with the zeal and ability which had been shown by the Controller and Auditor General and the staff of officers under their command. The passage in the Report of the Public Accounts Committee to which the hon. Member had referred was merely intended to point out that at present there was no sufficient check upon the financial concerns of the Post Office. In making these observations he merely wished to guard against an inference being drawn by the hon. Member for Brighton from a passage in the Report, which it was not intended to bear by the Committee.

MR. LIDDELL said, that if any blame was to be attached to the Audit Department, he thought it was to be attributable to the Treasury, for the Audit Office was undermanned.

Resolutions agreed to.

SALMON FISHERIES COMMISSIONERS

BILL.—[Bill 85.]

(Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading, read.

MR. DODDS inquired of the Government, Whether they would consent to continue the present Salmon Fishery Commissioners, and to give them extended powers?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he could not give the hon. Gentleman any pledge on the subject. Such was certainly not the present intention of the Government.

MR. DODDS expressed his regret that the Government should have thought it necessary to hurry this Bill through the House at this early period of the Session, and he complained that the Bill superseded the present Salmon Fishery Commissioners just at a time when their labours were becoming more valuable than ever, and the results from those labours were becoming every day more apparent in the increased production of salmon. In his opinion the proper course would have been not only to have continued them, but to have given them extended powers. As Chairman of the Salmon Fisheries Committee which sat some Sessions ago, he could bear testimony to the admirable manner in which they had performed their duties. They had inspected most, if not all, of the large rivers in England, and had made the most searching inquiries, the result being that regulations were adopted which had had the effect of largely increasing the production of salmon. He had fully expected that the Government would have inserted a clause in this Bill continuing their existence, if it were only for two or three years, and he expressed himself much disappointed at finding they had not. It was useless of course to oppose the measure; but he must express his opinion that the gentlemen to whom he had alluded had been very coldly treated by the Government.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, that he did not in the least deny that the services which the Commissioners whom it was proposed to supersede by this Bill had rendered had been most valuable to the country; but, at the same time, the Government were of opinion that, for all real practical purposes, their work was done. They had held very few sittings during the past two years, and it must be remembered that the cost of maintaining the Commission was many thousands of pounds a-year; and the Government did not feel justified in incurring any longer the expense of continuing the Commissioners, and especially of extending their powers. He fully concurred in the praise bestowed by the hon. Gentleman on the Commissioners; but for the reason he had stated the Government were of opinion that the time had arrived when they must cease to avail themselves of their services, however valuable.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN TRAMWAYS PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

Order [7th March] that the Metropolitan Tramways Provisional Orders Bill be committed to a Select Committee read, and discharged.

Select Committee appointed, "to consider the schemes contained in the Metropolitan Tramways Provisional Orders Bill of this Session, and to report whether, in their opinion, it is desirable that all or any of the proposed lines of Tramways should be constructed within the Metropolitan area under the jurisdiction respectively of the Corporation of the City of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works."

Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament of last Session, appointed to inquire into the question of Metropolitan Tramways, together with the Report of the Board of Trade upon the Railway, Canal, Tramway, &c. Bills of the present Session, with Map of the Metropolitan Tramways, referred to the said Committee.

Report of the Board of Trade, dated 5th May 1871, of their proceedings under "The Tramways Act, 1870," with regard to the proposed Tramways in and about the Metropolis, also referred to the Committee.—(Mr. Arthur Peel.)

And, on March 28, Committee nominated as follows:—Sir FRANCIS GOLDSMID, Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Sir JOHN ST. AUBYN, Mr. ALGERNON EGERTON, Mr. LOCKE, Mr. JOHN STEWART HARDY, and Sir WILFRID LAWSON:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

WAYS AND MEANS.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (£9,317,346 19s. 9d.) BILL.

Resolutions [March 21] reported:

1. "That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, for the service of the years ending the 31st day of March 1872 and 1873, the sum of £453,346 19s. 9d. be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

2. "That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, the sum of £8,864,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

Resolutions agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. BAXTER, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY GLADSTONE.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

THE EASTER RECESS.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he thought it would be convenient to many of their Lordships if his noble Friend (Earl Granville) could give the House some information as to the business for the next fortnight, and as to the day of adjourning for the Easter Recess, and the day on which their Lordships were to re-assemble.

EARL GRANVILLE: I believe that as regards the public business no inconvenience will arise if your Lordships adjourn on Friday, the 4th April, for the Easter Recess, and re-assemble on Monday, the 21st April.

MARRIAGES (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 40.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to remove doubts which were entertained as to whether the provisions of 26 & 27 Vict., c. 27, relating to the registration of places of public worship in Ireland and the solemnization of marriages therein, extended to the body or people calling themselves "the Catholic and Apostolic Church," but better known as Irvingites. The difficulty had arisen from the Registrar having refused to register the places of worship of this body because, on conscientious grounds, they declined to call themselves either "Protestant Christians" or "Roman Catholic Christians." Before the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland was disestablished, the marriages of those persons were solemnized according to the rites of that Church, and since the disestablishment four such marriages had been solemnized in that Church; but two eminent ecclesiastical lawyers considered that in the cases of those four marriages the parties could not be regarded as having been married "in accordance with the statute." The Bill therefore proposed to remove these doubts by extending the Act of the 26 & 27 Vict., to members of the Catholic and Apostolic Church; and the 4th clause affirmed the validity of any marriages heretofore celebrated between members of that Church in the same manner as if they had been "Protestant Episcopalians." Clause 2 would empower the chief minister of the Church of this body to grant special licences for the marriage of persons being both members of that Church at any convenient place in Ireland. The Bill had passed through the Commons with the sanction of the Government, and therefore, he presumed, there would be no objection to it on the part of their Lordships.

—(The Viscount Midleton.)

LORD REDESDALE must say that for a very small body, however respectable, to style itself "the Catholic and Apostolic Church" was a rather strong thing. The Irish Church, though disestablished, considered itself the Catholic and Apostolic Church in Ireland, and no doubt the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland would call itself by that name; but for a small body, which for all that appeared might only consist of persons worshipping "in the Catholic and Apostolic Church, Adelaide Road, Dublin," to be so described in an Act of Parliament would scarcely be satisfactory. Again, he thought the power of granting special licences to persons being members of the said Catholic and Apostolic Church, which the 2nd clause would confer on the "minister of the said Church for the time being officiating as chief minister of the congregation of members of the said Church at present worshipping in the Adelaide Road Church," was very objectionable.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not but think the objections just urged by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees deserved consideration. If the Bill passed in its present form, there would be really nothing to identify this body. They were described as "the body or people known as the Catholic and Apostolic Church." That title was equally claimed by the Roman Catholics, and the Church of England—not to speak of other bodies—also claimed to be part of the Catholic and Apostolic Church, in the unity of which belief is professed by all who accept the Nicene creed. It was true that in a subsequent part of the Bill there was mention of "the congregation of members of the said Church at present worshipping in the Catholic and Apostolic Church, Adelaide Road, Dublin;" but he did not know whether that congregation was meant to be referred to as constituting the whole of the "body known as the Catholic and Apostolic Church." There was nothing in the Bill to prevent its applying to all the Christians in Ireland. He concurred with the noble Chairman of Committees in thinking that the wide power of granting special licences which the 2nd clause would confer would be objectionable; and he thought that the requirement that both parties to the marriage were members of that Church would give rise to difficulties of proof. The introduction of such Bills showed the importance of legislating on the Report of the Royal Commission on the Marriage Laws, with the view of rendering such Bills unnecessary. They led to mischievous anomalies. At the same time, it was only right that the obstacles in the way of the solemnization of marriages between members of this highly respectable body should be removed, and therefore he did not oppose the Bill; but he hoped that before it left Committee some alterations would be made in it for the better identification of this body and to remove the objection to the 2nd clause.

LORD O'HAGAN said, he had only just seen the Bill. He concurred in what had just been said by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. Indeed, he thought that the power which would be conferred by the 2nd clause might lead to great malversation. This was no doubt a respectable body of persons, who ought to have the protection of the law; but he objected to their minister having the power to authorise the marriage of whomsoever he pleased, without check or identification of parties.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought it would be a great advantage if their Lordships were to appoint a Committee every Session for the purpose of revising Bills brought into the House of Commons by private Members. Their Lordships rarely knew anything of the circumstances under which they were brought in—they were usually drawn with very little care, and the Government did not exercise over them that supervision which it was necessary they should receive from some authority. Of course, in the case of Government Bills, Parliament had the security which the talent and experience of the Government draftsman afforded; but at present there was nothing to prevent the insertion in Private Bills of anomalies such as those which had been pointed out in the present Bill by his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees and his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he had no wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the Bill to relieve the body in whose interest this measure was promoted; but, after what had been said in the course of the discussion, it was evident that the Bill contained provisions of a very anomalous character, and therefore he would advise his noble Friend who had charge of it to postpone the Committee until after Easter, and to communicate in the meantime with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in order that the Bill might do just what was wanted and not a great deal more.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

MERCANTILE MARINE.

ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE asked when a Royal Commission or a Committee is to be appointed to inquire into the state of our Merchant Shipping as regards their being seaworthy, and as regards the safety of the lives of the seamen who went to sea in them; also with regard to the present law of insurance of ships; and as to when the investigation will commence? The noble Earl said that the subject had been so fully and ably brought before Parliament and the country by Mr. Plimsoll that it would not be necessary for him to say much upon the subject—he would, however, urge upon the Government that there should be no delay in taking action on this subject. Of course with respect to what was said of private individuals or of companies in Mr. Plimsoll's book he could say nothing; but as to the broad statements it contained he believed them to be correct, for they were confirmed by his own personal experience. The reason that he urged that there should be no delay in taking action was that the loss of life at sea was occurring day by day. Within the last two months he believed there had been 300 instances of total loss of ships, and of course there had been a proportionate loss of life.

These losses were not confined to coasting vessels—a great many of the vessels wrecked, were timber ships coming from Canada. These ships had all deck-loads, and these deck-loads were the occasion, in a very great measure, of the loss of the ships. He believed that Her Majesty's Government could not directly interfere with these timber ships, because the Dominion of Canada made its own laws, and there was no law at present to prevent deck-loads. He was, however, happy to say that he heard that the Government of Canada had taken the subject up, and were about to introduce a law prohibiting deck-loads on timber-ships between September and May inclusive. Many years ago this was our own law—we did not permit deck-loads to be carried during that period of the year; but in consequence of certain alterations in the Customs laws this particular law was not now in force. The loss of these timber-ships did not merely cause dreadful suffering and loss of life to the men on board them, but as these abandoned timber-ships would not sink, everyone of them became a floating rock, and any ship at night or in a fog might run against one of these floating timber-ships and founder instantly. Only the other day one of Her Majesty's frigates the Immortalité was sent to look after a water-logged timber-laden ship, and to bring her to shore or sink her. She fell in with her off Scilly, but in consequence of the weather, could not get quite close to her; she then tried to sink her by firing into her, but in consequence of the buoyancy of her cargo, could not effect that either. The question was, what was the cause of the loss of so many ships? In his humble opinion, it was that they were sent to sea overloaded. If with iron or coals, these cargoes stowed in bulk were liable to shift in bad weather—and even corn would swell with the water or shift. Again, many merchant ships went to sea improperly manned. If such ships succeeded in getting out of the Channel with a fair wind and fair weather, they proceeded on their voyages; but if bad weather was met with in the Channel the crews were totally unfit to manage them—there were not sufficient hands to take the sails off the ship, and her sails were blown away, she capsized, or she went ashore. Another point was, that the merchant ships were badly found; in many cases their rigging, sails, and spars were not in a good state; and very often the ships themselves were totally unfit to go to sea. In many cases the hulls were rotten, and were not fit to stand a breeze. Last year he ventured to state that he thought that if there were no insurance there would not be half the loss of vessels, and he was now confirmed in that opinion. He did not say that insurance could be altogether done away with, but he thought that a check ought to be put upon insurance;—he thought that if no ship-owner were allowed to insure more than two-thirds of the value of the ship, so that he should always have one-third at his own risk, the consequence would be that a shipowner would take care never to send his ship to sea improperly equipped or improperly manned. Many people thought that sailors knew what ships were, and that they need not sail in any particular ship if they did not like her; but in truth they entered a ship knowing scarcely anything about her. They were bound by Act of Parliament to go to a register office, where they were entered, and they then signed articles and got an advance note. The men were generally living at a public-house, which was kept by a crimp, who got the advance tickets, and supplied them with what they wanted until it was time to go on board. If the sailor did not go on board, the crimp lost the money upon the advance note, and he therefore generally took the men on board drunk or half drunk—at a place like Gravesend. The captain knew that if he did not sail directly he might lose his men—the tug lay under his bows with her steam up, and the moment the master got the men aboard, he gave the order to go ahead:—and he never went near to a port in the Channel if he could avoid it. If they were caught in a south-west breeze the vessel began to leak, and the master was then obliged, against his will, to put into Portland, Plymouth, or Falmouth; and then the men, finding that the ship was not well found, that she leaked a good deal, and that she was shorthanded, refused to go to sea in her; the Custom-house people came on board, but they could not examine the ship properly when she was loaded; and the result often was that the crews were put into gaol, and the gaols at Dorchester, Plymouth, or Falmouth were always full of them. He was aware that a great number of lawless and lazy fellows signed to go on board ships, and tried to run away when they put into port; but generally those fellows were not regular seamen, but rogues who had made the shore too hot for them. Such men deserved to be sent to gaol, but he was convinced that many seamen were wrongly imprisoned for refusing to go to sea, the reason for their refusal being the unsound state of the vessels. Sailors were the only class of working-men not protected by Parliament. The only thing which Parliament had done for them was to compel ships to carry lime juice. Of course, when a ship carried passengers, there was legal protection for passengers; but that protection was given for the sake of the passengers, and not for that of the seamen. It was time there was a change, and he therefore begged to ask the Question of which he had given Notice—namely, when the Royal Commission or a Committee was to be appointed to inquire into the state of our Merchant Shipping as regarded their being seaworthy, and as regarded the safety of the lives of the seamen who went to sea in them; also with regard to the present law of insurance of ships; and as to when the investigation would commence.

EARL COWPER said, that, however important and interesting the subject might be, it was not necessary for him to enter into it in detail, because the whole matter was to be immediately referred to a Royal Commission. He had to inform their Lordships that the Commission was very nearly constituted—indeed, he hoped that before the week was out Mr. Fortescue would be able in the other House to announce the names of the Commissioners, and that the Commission would get to work immediately. He might add that his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies was in communication with the authorities of Canada with reference to the timber-ships.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that this subject was one of the gravest that had ever occupied the public mind. Her Majesty's Government must be aware of the sensation produced by Mr. Plimsoll's book. Whether the details in the book were true or were not was what he could not take on him to affirm; but this he did venture to say, that if only one-quarter of them were so, it was a record of some of the most diabolical practices ever had recourse to, even in ages of great crimes. Her Majesty's Government had granted a Commission to investigate the subject: but he would suggest to them whether there was any chance of a Report from that Commission in sufficient time for legislation in the present Session—or indeed for a very long period. The area of inquiry was wide, and probably the Report would be a very long one. If there could be no legislation on the subject this Session, Her Majesty's Government ought to take care that between the present time and that at which they could act on the Report there should be a searching inspection of merchant ships before going to sea. It was stated—but he knew that such things were exaggerated—that no fewer than 4,000 seamen were drowned every year; but if only one-fourth of that number perished from the causes described in Mr. Plimsoll's book it was the duty of the Government, without waiting for the Report of the Commission, to see that a careful inspection of ships was carried out, if for the present nothing further in the way of protection could be done by the State. The noble and gallant Earl (the Earl of Lauderdale) had said that care was taken on board ships which carried passengers. He was afraid that was not always the case. He said this in consequence of an instance which had come to his own knowledge. At the end of last year the mail packet from Liverpool to Madeira left the former port with such a deck-load, that having got as far as the Irish Channel, she being in great peril was obliged to put back to Liverpool to be lightened of her load. Of course, as she was a vessel carrying Her Majesty's mails and many passengers, she must have been more or less under the inspection of official persons. When he found, then, such an occurrence as he had referred to in the case of a mail packet, he was forced to believe, however reluctantly, that at least many of Mr. Plimsoll's statements must, unfortunately, be correct.

EARL COWPER said, the Government were anxious that there should be as little delay as possible, and therefore it was intended to separate the heads of inquiry, so that the Royal Commission might in the first instance investigate the most important subjects—those of the unseaworthiness of ships and overloading. He did not think that the inquiry on those two branches need cause very much delay, and therefore he did not see any reason why there might not be some legislation on the subject before the termination of the present Session.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE wished to observe that, though the loss of ships was increasing, the loss of life by sea was not. This was to be accounted for by the efficiency of our life-boats, which were much more numerous around our coast.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MARRIAGE LAW.—QUESTION.

MR. SALT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, since it has often been found necessary to introduce Bills similar to a recent Act entitled the Tiverton and Cove Chapels Act, in order to give validity to marriages that may be technically irregular, he will introduce a general Bill for the improvement of the Marriage Law?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he must acknowledge the inconvenience of passing a series of Acts to correct irregularities, but he could not undertake on the part of the Government to deal during the present Session with so large and important a Question.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. T. HUGHES asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether further consideration on behalf of the troops entitled to the Banda and Kirwee Booty will be given by the Secretary of State to the claim which, in his Despatch No. 119, of 11th May 1871, he held to be borne out, for interest on 14½ lakhs (1,465,335 rupees) of Mogul rupees, captured by General Whitlock's force, and kept by the Government of India, from 1858 until 1862, in the State Treasury at Allahabad; why the moneys, which appear from the protest of the Prize Agents to have been excluded from their contract with the auctioneer, were forced to auction by the authorities at Calcutta at a cost of about £6,000 for auction commission; whether it is intended that the troops should be indemnified by the Indian Government for the loss; and, if not, upon what grounds; and, whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been or will be taken as to the validity of these claims, or as to the equity of referring them, under the Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 65, s. 22, if disputed, for judicial settlement?

MR. GRANT DUFF: My reply, Sir, to my hon. Friend's first Question must be in the negative, the Secretary of State in Council having decided that the claim alluded to in that Question is unfounded. In reply to his second Question, I have to say that the course adopted with regard to the moneys, or rather bullion, to which he refers was adopted as being that which the Government of India thought the best for all concerned. In reply to his third Question, I have to say that the claim of the troops to the indemnification referred to was submitted by their agents to the Treasury, the competent authority in such cases, which after hearing counsel decided against them. In reply to his fourth Question, I have to say that the Secretary of State in Council sees no reason for re-opening a matter which he considers to be res judicata.

THE MAGISTRACY—LEAMINGTON.

QUESTIONS.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL PARKER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to a statement in the "Leamington Courier" of the 15th March, that, at a meeting of the Labourers' Union in that town, a justice of the peace was instructed to communicate with the Labourers' Association in Ireland with a view of preventing their migration into this Country during the pressure of harvest work; and, if the statement is true, whether such an undertaking is consistent with the duties of a justice of the peace?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that he had seen the Report to which the Questions of the hon. and gallant Member referred. The magistrate did not appear to have been acting as a magistrate on the occasion, but unofficially; and, as he had done nothing illegal, he could not regard this action on his part as a private person as being inconsistent with his duty as a magistrate.

THE TREASURY AND THE POST OFFICE—ALLEGED MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWOETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering that the Treasury and other Government Departments may be implicated in the misappropriation of the Savings Bank Deposits and Postal Revenues to the Telegraph Capital Account, he will consider the desirability, in order to secure a full and impartial investigation, of intrusting the promised inquiry not to the Treasury as is suggested, but either to the Committee of Public Accounts, or to a Committee nominated by the Committee of Selection?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Question of my hon. Friend seems to have been dictated by an entire misapprehension of the stage at which we have arrived in this important matter. It would certainly be a very bad compliment to the Committee on Public Accounts, who appear to have treated the subject with much care and consideration, to fly in the face of the recommendation they have made by refusing to commit the matter to the investigation of the Treasury. At the same time, I do not think I am in saying this running counter to the view of the hon. Member. The Committee on Public Accounts, having very properly considered that the Treasury is officially superior to the Post Office, have concluded that it is the business of the Treasury to inquire into this matter. But it does not follow that the inquiry by the Treasury is the final step. When the inquiry at the Treasury has been completed—and I am sure my right hon. Friend will press it forward with all dispatch—it will be for the House to determine what further steps should be taken in the matter.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—EXAMINATIONS. QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Treasury claims a right to make direct appointments in the Civil Service to Officers included in Schedule A of the Order in Council of 4th June 1870, without the persons so appointed having complied with the conditions as to examination prescribed in Article 5 of the Order in Council, or obtained from the Civil Service Commissioners the certificate of qualification required by Article 7 in all cases in which the conditions of Article 5 may be dispensed with.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the conditions under which appointments were filled depended upon whether the appointment to the office was vested in some public Department by an Act of Parliament or not. No Order in Council could alter or repeal, or in any way vary an Act of Parliament, and any Department having the right to appoint to an office under an Act of Parliament might make such appointment without conforming to the regulations of the Order in Council referred to.

MERCANTILE MARINE—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any inquiry has been held, or, if not, whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to hold an inquiry, as to the alleged truth of the circumstances attending the loss of the schooner "Charles" of Wexford, with all hands, in the month of January last, when, according to the report in the public journals, it appeared that while lying in a disabled and sinking condition, from injuries supposed to have been received by striking on the Arklow Bank, she was approached by the steamer "Countess" on her voyage from London to Dublin, which vessel remained by her for about three hours, but ultimately steamed away upon her course without rendering any assistance, leaving the crew of the ill-fated schooner, who were at that time clinging to the rigging, to perish; and, if such inquiry has been held, whether the above statement is in accordance with facts?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, that an inquiry had been ordered by the Board of Trade into this case. He might say that the Solicitors of the Board of Trade thought it very doubtful whether there was sufficient ground to justify an inquiry; but he thought it better to be on the safe side, and allow the inquiry to proceed.

MR. R. W. DUFF asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will cause an immediate investigation into the seaworthy condition of the brig "Maggie," now lying in the Frith of Forth, four of the crew of which have been sentenced to a month's imprisonment in Edinburgh Gaol for refusing to proceed to sea, alleging the vessel would not steer, was overloaded, undermanned, and leaky?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, the Board of Trade had at present no power of its own accord to survey ships under the circumstances occupied by the Maggie. It appeared that the seamen referred to had been sent to gaol for refusing to proceed on their voyage, and the Board of Trade were in communication with the Home Office on the subject. These seamen need not have been sent to gaol if a survey of the ship had been made by the order of a magistrate and she had been found to be unseaworthy. With respect to any further proceedings on the part of the Board of Trade, if the hon. Member would make a complaint in writing, giving the information required by the Act, the Board would then be in a position to say whether the ship should be surveyed. If a prima facie case could be made out against the owners steps could then be taken in the matter.

MR. HAMBRO asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the result of a survey made at Falmouth of the ship "Sir Robert MacDonnell" by the Surveyor to the Board of Trade has not been to prove that the ship is unseaworthy; and, Whether he intends to proceed against the owners of the "Ceres" under Section 11 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1871, which, by the Report of the inquiry held at Glasgow in February last, appears to have been unseaworthy when sent to sea?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, that the Board of Trade had made a preliminary survey of the ship Sir Robert MacDonnell, and the result showed she was in a leaky state. The Surveyors could not pronounce her to be seaworthy. In this case there was no resistance on the part of the owners to the power of detaining and examining the vessel as given by the recent Act. They were about to have the cargo taken out, in order that a proper examination might take place. With respect to the Ceres, he saw by the report of a Scotch paper which had been handed to him that a survey ordered by the Sheriff showed as far as it went that the men in this case had no good reason for refusing to proceed upon their voyage. But he had ordered the evidence to be referred to the professional and legal advisers of the Board of Trade with a view to see whether it was a case in which further proceedings ought to be taken.

MR. HAMBRO asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will take into consideration the case of certain seamen who are confined in Usk Gaol, undergoing a sentence of six weeks' hard labour for refusing to go to sea in the ship "Sir Robert MacDonnell," which left Newport last month for Monte Video, and which afterwards put into Falmouth, where she has since been surveyed by the Surveyor to the Board of Trade and pronounced unseaworthy?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that on reading the hon. Gentleman's Question he telegraphed at once to the magistrates at Newport to obtain the information on which they committed the men to prison. Upon receiving their answer he would act with due regard to the circumstances of the case, and the Report of the Board of Trade.

Afterwards—

MR. LIDDELL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in the event of the facts adduced bringing home, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, culpability in sending a ship to sea, they have the legal power to enforce an ulterior charge against the owners?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, said, in reply, he believed that under the recent Act the Board of Trade would have power of proceeding against the owners for misdemeanour for having sent a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. EYKYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is intended to bring forward the Public Prosecutors Bill this Session?

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

Mr. BRUCE, in reply, said, that his hon. Friend was aware that he had, on the part of the Government, undertaken last year to introduce a Bill, and he had not abandoned that intention. In consequence, however, of hearing that the Judicature Commission were about to take the question into consideration, he postponed the introduction of the Bill until he should have the benefit of the recommendations of the Commission. He had now had an opportunity of learning the opinions of the Commissioner, and the Bill which he hoped soon to introduce had been framed after consideration of those opinions, and in general conformity with them.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (BOROUGH FUNDS) ACT.—QUESTION.

Mr. RATHBONE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will bring in a Bill, during the present Session, to amend the Municipal Corporations (Borough Funds) Act?

Mr. BRUCE, in reply, said, the subject had been carefully examined, both by his Department and by that of his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board; but he was not as yet prepared to say what Amendments should be made in the Act of last Session. He did consider, however, that some Amendments might be properly introduced.

MERCANTILE MARINE—LOSS OF THE "SEA QUEEN."

ORDER.—RULES OF DEBATE.—QUESTION.

Mr. MELLY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to a speech by the honourable Member for Derby, in which he is reported to have made the following statement:—

"As to the animus of the Board of Trade, the Honourable Gentleman cited the case of an inquiry ordered by the House of Commons into the loss of the "Sea Queen," with twenty lives, in which the damning evidence of the Custom House officers and the lumpers as to the unseaworthy state of the ship had, he said, been deliberately suppressed, and a surveyor's report printed in the Blue Book, trying to exculpate the owners from their responsibility, they having, he declared, pocketed £25,000, as the profit of sinking, the owner, too, having superintended the loading;"

and, whether such statement is correct?

Mr. HORSMAN: Before this Question is answered, I wish, Sir, to call your attention to it on a point of Order as being both inconvenient and objectionable. If a Member of this House makes a public statement, and then a Minister be asked whether that statement be or be not true, of course, if the Minister replies that it is not true, the hon. Member in his place may re-affirm that it is true, and may enter into details to prove that it is true. It is evident that must give rise to discussion, and therefore I put it to you, Sir, whether the Question is one that ought to be answered by the President of the Board of Trade?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent (Mr. Melly) has called the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to a statement made by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) out of this House; and I am asked by the right hon. Member (Mr. Horsman), whether there is anything irregular in putting a Question on that point. I am bound to say that I see nothing irregular in the Question of the hon. Member; but that Question is followed up by these words, "and whether such statement is correct." If the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent questions a statement made by a Member of this House, such a proceeding is irregular; but I do not understand that the hon. Member questions the statement made by the hon. Member for Derby. He only inquires of the President of the Board of Trade, whether the conduct of the officers of the Board of Trade was such as is stated by the hon. Member for Derby?

Mr. MELLY: I assure you, Sir, that nothing is further from my intention than to imply, even in the most indirect manner, any doubt of the statement made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby. But a statement having been made which appears capable of explanation, I thought it best for all purposes that that explanation should be given at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. PLIMSOLL: May I beg to say a word or two? ["Order!"]

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, I quite understand the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Melly) as one not involving the veracity of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), but dictated by a desire to know whether I could throw any light on the facts of this case. I wish to give an answer with all the fulness I can, and the more so as it is a matter in which I am not personally concerned, it having happened a year before I became connected with the Board of Trade. The very extraordinary statements in the speech of the hon. Member for Derby the other night certainly require to be answered and contradicted. The information I have to give the House is this—First of all, the inquiry into the case of the Sea Queen was not ordered by the House of Commons—these inquiries are never ordered by the House of Commons—but was undertaken by the Board of Trade. The evidence of the Revenue officers was not suppressed, as the statement of the hon. Member for Derby implies. The facts are these:—An hon. Member of this House (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) gave Notice of a Question on the subject of this vessel on the 29th of March, 1870. He furnished the Board of Trade with certain letters, which alleged that the Sea Queen, which had gone down at sea, I think, without any survivors, had been dangerously overloaded at starting. On the same day—the 5th of April—the owners of the vessel sent to the Board of Trade the bill of lading and other documents; and upon the same day I find that these papers so volunteered were sent by the Board of Trade to the Collector of Customs at Newcastle, with instructions to inquire and report. On the 8th of April the Board of Trade received a reply from the Collector of Customs confirming with his opinion the allegation that the vessel was overloaded, and enclosing a statement from Mr. Bell, Examining Officer of Customs, to the effect that she was so overloaded. On the same day an inquiry was ordered by the Board of Trade. That inquiry was held at Newcastle, and lasted from the 28th of April till the 5th of May. The first witness examined was Mr. Bell, the Examining Officer, who made the statement I have referred to. The second witness was Mr. Lawson, the Chief Clerk of Customs at Newcastle, who had cleared the ship. The third witness was Mr. Sansom, senior Examining Officer and Acting Surveyor of Customs. Two other out-door officers of Customs, Mr. Newton and Mr. Kirkpatrick, were examined on the 30th of April. These officers were all sworn and cross-examined, and their evidence was given at length in the report of the inquiry presented to Parliament (Parliamentary Paper, No. 290, 1870). The statement originally given by Mr. Bell to the Collector at Newcastle was stated in the evidence to have been put in at the inquiry. This paper, however, with other papers stated to have been put in, appears never to have been sent to the Board of Trade, by whom the Report and evidence were sent to the printers precisely as they were received from the inquiry. I am not sure whether that point was in the mind of the hon. Member for Derby or not; but it is immaterial, since the preliminary Report to the Board of Trade was not made the subject of cross-examination as it was not on oath; whilst Mr. Bell, the author of the Report, was subsequently examined and cross-examined on oath, and his evidence is contained in the Papers moved for—namely, the Report and Evidence of the Court of Inquiry, which consisted of two magistrates and two professional assessors—one a Mercantile Marine captain, and the other a commander of the Royal Navy. It is not a fact that the evidence of the lumpers, as they are called, who discharged the cargo of the vessel was suppressed by order of the Board of Trade. It is not a fact that a surveyor's report was printed in the Blue Book trying to exculpate the owners from their responsibility. The facts are as follows:—The summoning of witnesses in these cases is left to the discretion of the solicitor who conducts the cases. His instructions are to summon all material and necessary witnesses, and he does so. In the present case he, no doubt, thought that the lumpers could add nothing to the mass of evidence already given. There was, in fact, a large mass of evidence given on the subject of overloading. I have to-day, for my own satisfaction, telegraphed to the Solicitor of Customs who conducted the inquiry, and asked him a question on the subject; and this is his reply—

"I conducted the inquiry 'in re Sea Queen,' and I adduced all the evidence that was available and material. It is wholly incorrect to say that I received any instructions from the Board of Trade to suppress any evidence."

I am sure it is not necessary for me to assure the House of Commons that the gentlemen who are the superior permanent officials of the Board of Trade would have been utterly incapable of such an act as the suppression of evidence before a court of inquiry, or the suppression of it in this Paper, which was moved for and presented to the House of Commons. The hon. Member appears to fancy that a document was appended to that Parliamentary Paper for the express purpose of exculpating the owners, who, he implies, were in some collusion with the Board of Trade officials for that purpose. What happened is this:—The Report of that Court did not appear to the Board of Trade to be satisfactory. It was a vague and almost a self-contradictory Report. They reported against the practice of overloading, whilst, at the same time, they reported that “the Sea Queen was not overladen to such an extent as to render her dangerous.” Under these circumstances, the Board of Trade of that day wished to clear up the matter, and they desired to have the best professional opinion they could obtain as to the practical and technical question whether a vessel, constructed and laden like the Sea Queen, could be considered safe and seaworthy or not. For that purpose they referred the case and all the evidence to their Chief Surveyor, Mr. Galloway. The Report he gave is here, and was added to the Parliamentary Paper. That Report does not tend, in the slightest degree, to exculpate the owners; it merely shifts the nature of the fault committed by the owners, because it says that, in the opinion of Mr. Galloway, it was not a question of freeboard—of that he thought the vessel had sufficient—but a question of strength; and he considered her strength was not sufficient to enable her to carry a large cargo of dead weight in safety. That Report was not so favourable to the owners as the Report of the Commission of Inquiry; and there is not a shadow of excuse for saying that the Report was added for the purpose of exculpating the owners. It was done in the interests of truth, and for the purpose of assisting the Board of Trade to come to some satisfactory conclusion as to the cause of the loss. The Board of Trade thought it necessary to add the Report to the Papers before Parliament; but how the addition of that Report can have diminished the value of those Papers, or shown any bad animus on the part of the Board of Trade, I cannot comprehend.

ARMY—THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

MR. WINGFIELD BAKER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has made or contemplates making any arrangements for calling out the Militia this year so as least to interfere with the interests of agricultural labourers and their employers, according to the different times that suit different parts of the country?

MR. CARDWELL: I am, Sir, always desirous to consider as much as possible the convenience both of the agricultural labourer and his employer. The state of the case is this:—The commanding officer suggests the time for calling out the regiment, and the general officer commanding in the district is instructed to enter into communication with him on the subject.

TRANSIT OF VENUS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would state to the House what stations have been selected by the Astronomer Royal for the proposed observations of the transit of Venus in 1874; whether it is proposed to adopt Halley's method; and, whether we are acting by ourselves in the matter, or in concert with Russia?

MR. GOSCHEN: Sir, if the hon. Baronet will allow me I will answer the Question, as the matter is in the hands of the Admiralty. The stations selected by the Astronomer Royal are Alexandria, Honolulu, Rodriguez, Christchurch (New Zealand), and Kerguelen's Island. At Rodriguez, Christchurch, and Kerguelen's Island the entire transit will be visible, and therefore the method of utilizing the observations by comparing the duration of transit at a southern station with the duration as observed in the French, German, and Russian stations on or near the Japanese and Chinese Seas (Halley's method) can be used for those three British stations; and Kerguelen's Island in particular is very favourably situated for this method. But it is not probable that this method will be used, or at least that any importance will be attached to it. It is an essential part of the Astronomer Royal's plan—in which he is expressly followed by the French and Russians, and, it is believed, by the Germans also—that the longitude of every station should be accurately determined, and, when this is done, the method of comparison of the absolute Greenwich times at the different stations (De Lisle's method) is greatly superior to the method of comparison of durations at different stations (Halley's method). We are acting in perfect concert with Russia. Frequent correspondence on the whole subject has been maintained between the Astronomer Royal and the Director of the Russian Central Observatory of Pulkowa.

JURIES (IRELAND).—PRECEDENCE OF MOTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN wished to ask a Question which had reference to Business on the Paper for Friday next. He had given Notice of his intention to bring forward a subject of much importance affecting the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland, but his Notice stood so low down on the Paper that it was very doubtful whether it would in the ordinary course be reached. He had, therefore, to ask whether the hon. Member for Westminster, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, and the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex, who had precedence, would kindly give way to enable him to bring forward his Motion.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, though anxious to proceed with his Notice, he would readily yield precedence to the hon. Member for Carlisle, in consideration of the importance of his Motion as affecting the safety of the lives and property of the whole inhabitants of Ireland, which appeared to be practically in abeyance.

CURRENCY—THE BANK ACT.

RESOLUTION.

MR. ANDERSON rose to call the attention of the House to the currency system of the country, and to move a Resolution. The hon. Gentleman said: Sir, I have had considerable hesitation in carrying out my intention of bringing the subject before the House so immediately after the Ministerial crisis which we have just come through; but, in the fear that if I drew back now there might not be found any other time and occasion more convenient, I concluded to proceed. I know that the subject is one which, from its abstruse character, does not interest a great many Members of the House. I know that it is a subject which most men shun as a dangerous one—so beset with shoals and quicksands, in which many have lost themselves, that few now care to adventure upon it in any form, and still fewer will attempt it, whose views are in favour of a radical change in a system under which the wealthy classes become more wealthy, even while the poorer become more poor. It is one of the most important questions which any hon. Member of this House can undertake to deal with. It undoubtedly affects the national wealth and woe far more than any question of party politics, and perhaps more than any other question that has been before the country since the Free Trade settlement of 1846. That Free Trade settlement of 1846 has even increased the importance of the currency question, for the general stimulus then given to the commerce of the country greatly intensified all the money difficulties we have experienced since, and especially those three great crises in which our currency system was strained to the breaking point and gave way, showing the utter unsoundness of those theories on which it was based. Those theories are, as I understand them, that the precious metals are the only safe basis of currency; that if any paper currency at all is permissible it should be strictly the representative of gold, and instantly convertible into gold at the pleasure of the holder; that such a currency will be plentiful or scarce according to the plenty or scarcity of gold in the country; that it ought to be so, and that whatever disaster and ruin accompany a sudden contraction of the currency through an efflux of gold is a perfectly legitimate result, and a less evil than it would be to adopt any other basis of a less fluctuating character. This, of course, is the pure bullionist theory, but its advocates were always unable to carry it out in its integrity, and we have, therefore, been left with a hybrid currency consisting partly of coin, partly of a miscellaneous collection of notes, having very many degrees of convertibility, but for the most part bearing the character, only through the forbearance of the public, which, so far, has not demanded instant convertibility. The Bank of England has a right to issue £15,000,000 sterling on gold and other securities lodged in the issue department, and this issue, although a legal tender, does not require by law to have a single sovereign or an ounce of gold to back its convertibility. The English country banks have an authorised issue of £7,250,000 against which they are not required to hold any gold. The Scotch banks have an issue of £2,750,000 equally without obligation to hold gold; and the Irish banks have an issue of £6,500,000 equally free from that obligation. These together make £31,500,000 of note issue authorised by law without any stipulations for gold backing it, and therefore, if put to a severe test, certainly inconvertible. A great part of our trouble arises from our struggle in difficult times to keep up those inconvertible notes with a semblance of convertibility. But our other note issues, so far as gold-backing is concerned, are not entirely secured either. The Bank of England issue above £15,000,000 is against gold deposited in the issue department, and although I have heard a doubt expressed whether, in the event of the Bank's insolvency, that gold could be kept exclusively to redeem those notes, I believe it certainly can. The English country banks are allowed no over-issue; but the Scotch and Irish are entirely unlimited as to the extent of their over-issue, provided they have in their safes a sovereign against every pound note of over-issue. But this, though a check, does not amount to a safeguard, for there is no provision whatever for keeping those sovereigns to guarantee those notes; and if a bank become insolvent, undoubtedly the sovereigns would fall in as general assets, and the notes would have to rank like any other debt. Thus, it is evident that the whole of the English country bank notes, and Scotch and Irish bank notes—amounting at present to about £18,000,000—depend solely on the solvency of the issuers; and here, Sir, I wish to guard myself against being thought to cast any doubt upon any one of our banks of issue. I believe they are all highly respectable, solvent, and well-managed institutions, but they are only trading corporations; and I maintain that, however sound they may be, their solvency is not a proper basis on which to rest the currency of a great nation. Another great objection to the Act of 1844—and when I speak of the Act of 1844, I include the Acts of 1845, which were merely supplementary to the main Act—is that these Acts have created everywhere but in London a complete monopoly in banking. The profit on the right of issue has had the effect of doing this. For instance, notwithstanding the vast increase in all other commerce, we have now in Scotland fewer banks than we had in 1844. We have lost some, and not a single new one has been established. That monopoly has many evils. For instance, in 1844 we had banks to the extent of £12,000,000 of capital, holding deposits of £30,000,000; whereas now the capital has gone down, I think to £9,000,000, while the deposits have gone up to £75,000,000. I do not think it forms any part of the duty of the State to interfere with the mere trade of banking, or to legislate for the protection of depositors as they do in America; but it is certainly the duty of the State not to legislate in the opposite direction, by creating a monopoly, which forces all the savings of the country to accumulate in fewer hands, for in the event of any great shock to public credit the result would be more disastrous than if the risk were more distributed. I wish to leave the trade of banking perfectly free, and without legislative interference—and in order to do that it is necessary to detach from it entirely the right of creating currency, for the State can never be justified in leaving that unrestricted. But there is a third objection, though perhaps a minor one, to the system I have described—namely, that whatever the amount of issue the nation may think it expedient to sanction without gold backing, it brings in an annual profit to the issuer, and it seems to me a most absurd anomaly that such profit should be handed over to trading corporations, instead of the nation itself having the profit of the national issue. The nation, with very mistaken generosity, keeps in its own hands the metallic currency, on the most part of which there is a heavy loss, while it hands to others the paper currency on which there is a large profit. It seems to me high time this injustice were put an end to, and I commend the subject to the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a means of adding materially to his resources. I will now turn to the subject of gold. The Act of 1844 requires the Bank of England to receive whatever quantity of gold is brought to it, and to issue notes against that gold to the extent of £3 17s. 9d. per ounce. This is the most fatally bad of all the fallacies of the Bank Acts. It frequently fails to perform the function for which it was intended, while in the attempt to make it do so we have constantly recurring seasons of most aggravated commercial disaster. When the withdrawal of gold really does cause the curtailment of the paper issue—that is, whenever it succeeds in doing the thing which it was intended always to do—the result is ruinous to the trade of the country. Everyone rushes to secure a reserve, and the whole currency is at once locked up. What is really needed, then, is that, when gold is withdrawn from the circulation of the country, there should be something to take the place of the gold to carry on the domestic trade of the country, and for want of that we have rapid fluctuations in the discount rate, sometimes intensifying into absolute panic. The existence of the national gold store, with its weekly returns, does appear to me a machinery specially adapted to facilitate the operations of gold speculators at the public cost. Its supporters say that it does not even fix the price of gold. They say that the notes given for it are mere store vouchers, and that there is neither loss nor gain by them. Now it is quite true that there is neither loss nor gain to the bank, but the effect to the country is very different. These so-called store vouchers state their money value, which no other store vouchers do. You deposit iron, or wheat, or any other merchandise, and get a voucher for it, but the money value is not stated. It purports to be for so many tons of iron, or so many quarters of wheat, and it ought equally to be for so many ounces of gold. By naming the sterling value you fix the price, and the consequence of that is that either a glut or a famine is of longer continuance than it ought to be, for it must depend not on markets acting and reacting on each other, as all free and healthy markets do, but only on the action of the foreign markets. If the price were free, as soon as an efflux began, our price would begin to rise and so check it; whereas under our fixed price the efflux will go on till the foreign market falls, and all we can do is to raise the hire, which is a much slower remedy than raising the price. In the same way when an influx begins it would at once begin to check itself in a free market by the price drooping, but with us it must go on till foreign prices rise or till our slow process of lowering the hire sends it away. It is in that way that our fixed prices cause such great fluctuations in the discount rate. If the Bank Act has nothing to do with the fluctuations in the discount rate, I would like its supporters to explain why those fluctuations have been so frequent and extreme since that Act was passed—why the contrast is so marked between the years previous to 1844 and the years subsequent to that date. I can only go back to 1833, because previous to that year the Usury Laws had some effect in steadying the rate, at least they prevented it rising above 5 per cent; but from 1833 to 1844 there were only five changes, giving on an average only one change every two years. But since 1844 we have only had one year—1851—without a change, and we have had as many as 15 changes in one year, and we have had as many as five changes in one month. In the one month of August, 1870, we had as many changes as in the 11 years previous to 1844. Besides all the changes in those 11 years previous to 1844 ran between 4 per cent and 6 per cent. I might almost say between 4 per cent and 5 per cent, for there were only a few months of 6 per cent in 1839; but since 1844 our fluctuations have run between 2 per cent and 10 per cent. Last July we had a minimum of 3 per cent, while by November it had run up to 7 per cent, making the value of loanable capital more than double itself in four months; but in July, 1865, the minimum was 3 per cent; in July, 1866, it was 10 per cent; and in July, 1867, it was 2 per cent. Thus we had money at one date no less than five times the value it bore at another date, only one year distant. If those frequent and extreme fluctuations which have followed the Act of 1844 are not at all attributable to that Act, I should like to know what they are attributable to. If the answer is that they are owing to free trade, then the inference seems inevitable that a fettered and cramped currency is a bad accompaniment to Free Trade, and that when we freed our trade we should have placed our currency on a broader basis; whereas by the Act of 1844 we had just bound it in double fetters. All the changes and fluctuations are made to check the efflux of gold, or to bring it back if it has gone. But, as I have before said, merely to raise the hire is a far more slow and uncertain process than to raise the price. If France wanted gold from us she would raise the price above our fixed price, and at once get it; but our plan of raising the hire entirely failed in the panic of 1866 to bring us gold from France. During our three months of 10 per cent discount rate, the Bank of France kept their rate at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  and 4 per cent, yet their gold increased till they had actually over £28,000,000 sterling, while we with our prolonged 10 per cent rate, could not get above £12,000,000. The contrast with France is indeed remarkable. France issues no less than £112,000,000 sterling of credit notes, keeps up her bullion, keeps down her discount rate, and escapes panic; while we, with our small issues tied to the gold basis, fail in all. We have set up gold for our idol—we worship it with a senseless superstition. If a few millions of gold go out from the Bank we straightway plunge into insane panic, depreciate all our property, except gold—probably a hundred times the amount of the gold that has gone out; raise our hire for money four or five times what it was before; and at last, when our commerce is in collapse, when one half of our merchants are ruined and the other half on the brink of it, we give the Bank leave to issue a few more credit notes, as the only refuge from universal bankruptcy. Greater folly, greater insanity, greater crime could hardly be. More poverty, more misery, more broken hearts and more desolated homes, are due to this one cause than to all others put together. And the remedy, after all, is so easy—an extra issue of credit notes—that in every one of our great money panics has proved an immediate success—namely, in 1797, 1825, 1847, 1857, and 1866—at all times the remedy is the same; and yet we will not learn that what acts as an immediate remedy might, if applied a little earlier, have proved a preventive, and might even be the basis of a sounder system. Under our Free Trade system, the business of the country has increased to such an enormous extent that gold has become too narrow a basis for the conduct of that business. There is no doubt at all but for the extraordinary discoveries of gold in California and Australia, our currency would have broken down long ago, and we would have been obliged to turn to something else. Currency reformers, in fact, say there is no good ground for so narrow a basis as gold. They say that gold is only one form of stored-up labour, and that there is no reason why that one form alone should have representation. I admit that gold is necessary for our foreign import trade, but I do not see that it is so for our domestic trade. It may be said—"It is all very well to point out the defects of the present system, but what remedy do you propose in its place?" Now, I confess that when we come to consider how a remedy is to be contrived, we find wide differences of opinion among currency reformers. Everyone has a pet scheme of his own; and I admit that I myself am no exception to the rule. But, at the same time, I consider the present system is so radically bad that I would be inclined almost to welcome any change. I think many of the schemes for a more extended currency, based on Consols, are very feasible indeed; but I would prefer for myself something better. I should like to see something resembling the American system, without its defects, established in this country. I think that the United States national system of State notes, though not a perfect system, is a very bold step in the right direction, and is, perhaps, the best symbolic currency that the world has ever yet seen. Under such a system, notwithstanding her miserably cramped trade and her devastated fleets, America has succeeded in developing her resources wonderfully, and in paying off a very large part of her National Debt. America uses no gold whatever for her internal trade. She reserves it all for her foreign trade. Now, we have always been told that under such a condition of things all the gold would vanish from the country, and it would be impossible for our merchants to get gold to carry on their foreign trade. But that, let me say, is not the experience in America. They have there a class of traders called gold brokers, whose business it is to keep gold and deal in gold. When a foreign trader wants gold he simply goes to the broker and pays the market price for it. We, on the other hand, go upon a different principle. We give foreign traders access to our national gold store, and allow them to get it with too great facility, and without paying a proper price for it. Now, if we abolished our present gold store, and had recourse to a better system of currency, our foreign traders would also have to go to the brokers for gold. That is a thing which I think we ought to make them do. Something even better, however, might be done. My proposal is a National Bank with a right of issue somewhat resembling the issue department of the Bank of England, but free from all trade influences, free from Government control, and accountable only to Parliament. The only function of the National Bank should be to receive Government securities, and thereupon to open a credit account for notes to the extent of 80 per cent of these deposits. The banker would be entitled to draw the full amount of his dividend on these Consols; but, on the other hand, he would be charged an interest at the rate of 2 per cent on the daily balance of his note account—the dividends and interest to be both payable in gold, and the notes to be issued as low as one pound notes, and even lower. The issue in America goes down as low as one dollar, and there is, besides, a State issue as low down as 10 cents, to the vast convenience of the public. In England we practically adopt a similar currency, for at our clubs we generally get postage stamps instead of copper. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer might adopt the hint and turn it to some account. The advantages I would expect from such a system are—it would be free from the objections now urged against the Bank of England management. It would also be free from all Government control, and no Government would be able to turn the system to an improper purpose. Moreover, the extent of issue would depend entirely upon the ability of bankers to deposit Consols, and the willingness of the public to pay a per-centage on the use of the issue. The only thing new in this scheme is the charge of daily interest on the balance of the note account. That would prevent bankers from taking out more notes than was necessary for the use of their trade. It would, in fact, be a self-regulating issue which would not depreciate, because no banker would take out notes to lie idle, or to pay them away for a lower rate than that at which he had procured them. Now, this is no mere theory. A charge of daily interest is a mere importation from the Scotch system of banking. Under the Scotch system of banking every trader in the country receives interest on the daily balance of his trading account. The consequence is that every trader is pecuniarily interested in keeping out as little currency as possible. He pays to his bank account every pound of his daily collections in order to get interest upon it; and in the same way the same causes acting upon the larger amounts with which the bankers have to deal would produce the same result. The economy of circulation in Scotland is proved by the facts that the population of England is not seven times as large as that of Scotland, nor are the taxes of England seven times as large as those of Scotland, yet England absorbs upwards of 15 times the currency that Scotland requires for her transactions. I think that charging the banker 2 per cent for the benefit of the country would still leave him a fair profit on the issue, and would give the revenue a large return. And this is nothing new—it is merely the expansion of a system that now exists; for at present the Bank of England has by Act of Parliament the power to take possession of two-thirds of any lapsed issue of any English country banker, on condition of depositing Government securities and paying 2 per cent. Moreover, the revenue receives a further sum from the profits of note issue. It receives as commutation of the stamps on bank notes £139,500 a year, and it receives from the profits of issue from the Bank of England £138,500. £60,000—the composition from the Bank of England—is included in the £138,000 of profit received from the Bank of England, but the composition of the country bank notes is £139,500. Hon. Members who are incredulous as to this statement will find the one under the head of "stamps," and the other under the head of "miscellaneous," and the two together amount to £278,000. The public faith in such a note issue as I have sketched would certainly depend more upon its ultimate than upon its instant convertibility, but that ultimate convertibility would be more secure. Even our present note issue depends more upon ultimate convertibility than instant convertibility, because there are £31,500,000 that could not be instantly converted. Such a system would not give cheap money, but I have never advocated cheap money. I can see a good deal of evil in money being very cheap. What I want to see is steady money, and I think the plan I suggest would give steady money. I do not agree in the generally-expressed opinion that the bankers are very greatly interested in keeping up the present system. I do not think the bankers really benefit very much from it, for I find the average rate of discount is actually lower than it used to be. I find that the average discount rate for the years which have elapsed since 1844 has only been  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, while previous to 1844 it ran from 4 to 5 per cent pretty steadily. Therefore I do not think that the bankers derive such a benefit and have such a vested interest in the panics as is sometimes alleged against them, and I believe that they stand in their own light in supporting the present system. But, while I have in a manner sketched a proposal, I do not in the least wish to commit the House or any of my supporters, if I have any, to any form of remedy whatever. All I wish to commit the House to is the existence of certain very great evils, and to the need of inquiry. I am quite aware that the inquiry is not altogether new, and that the ground has been gone over to a considerable extent before. I know that a Committee of this House sat in 1848, and that in the same year there was a Committee of the House of Lords, but they came to absolutely opposite conclusions. There was also a Committee in 1857-8, which, after hearing a great deal of evidence, came, in my opinion, to a very inconclusive report indeed. They reported that the crisis of 1857 was due to excessive speculation and abuse of credit—but they failed to say what the excessive speculation was due to. They stopped too soon or did not go to the bottom of the subject. I think that the wild speculation was due to a systematic oscillation in the value of money, which destroyed all legitimate business. No merchant makes his calculation upon a very small rate of profits now, because he never knows whether a rapid change in the discount rate may not sweep them all away, and turn them into absolute loss. The merchants, therefore, are obliged to look to ventures in which there is a large profit, and large profit, of course, means large risk. In this way the character of our business and of our business men is becoming changed and deteriorated, and this is very greatly owing to the Bank Act and its influence. The Committee of the House of Lords in 1848 reported that the recent panic—the panic of 1847—was materially aggravated by the Bank Act. Therefore, the House of Lords and the House of Commons are entirely at issue upon the question, and for that reason I have asked for a Royal Commission instead of a Committee of this House. But since the last Committee reported, we have had another panic—the panic of 1866—which has not been inquired into at all, although it had some peculiar features of its own, such as the relative position of the Bank of France and of the Bank of England at that time. Then again the French have completed an important inquiry since that date; and they have come to a very different conclusion from the Committee of the House of Commons. Their conclusion was not that it was expedient to adopt our system. They have left their Bank perfectly free, and the course they have pursued is, I think, a question into which a Commission might very well inquire. Then, again, the United States national currency has been established since our inquiry. It has been in existence now for seven years, and is well worthy, I think, of being studied by a Royal Commission, and of being reported upon. For these reasons, I ask the Government to give me a Royal Commission in place of a Select Committee. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) asks for a Committee. I am glad to see that the hon. Member for Maidstone agrees with me in considering that inquiry is necessary. I believe that he really and honestly wants inquiry; but to appoint a Committee of this House at so late a period in the life of the Parliament, would, I think, be very apt to lead to an inconclusive result. Before any Report could be presented Parliament itself would have died, and some of the hon. Members who sat upon the Committee might not chance to be returned to the next Parliament. That, I think, is a cogent reason for asking for a Royal Commission, and not for a Committee of this House. In fact, I fear that to ask for a Committee of this House would be practically asking Parliament to shelve the question. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) has also an Amendment upon the Paper; but I am glad to see that he is only half-opposed to the Motion. He admits that there were evils attending the present Bank Act, and that it is not the self-acting, self-adjusting, automatic machine which its great propounder held out to us it was to be. But with such an admission on the face of his Amendment, I wish to know how it is that he refuses inquiry. If the hon. Member has any faith in his own views, he must see that inquiry would be in his favour, and would lead to the adoption of his opinions; therefore, instead of the hon. Member opposing inquiry, I confidently look to him to support it. I have endeavoured to make my statement, although rather a long one, as simple as possible. Nothing would have been easier for me than to have covered up the whole subject with a cloud of figures such as has been usually the case when Gentlemen have dealt with it. I have steadily avoided that, and where I have used figures I have employed round sums and not the exact sums. Thanking the House for its patience, I now beg, Sir, formally to move my Resolution.

MR. MUNDELLA seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the present system of Currency is dangerous to the commerce of the Country, and that some change is necessary to prevent such extreme fluctuations in the discount rate as have been frequent since the passing of the Bank Act of 1844, and that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the means of remedy for the evils complained of."—(Mr. Anderson.)

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: Fifteen years have now elapsed since the last Parliamentary inquiry into the operation of the laws by which the currency is regulated—fifteen years most eventful and instructive. Under these circumstances it is surely desirable that our financial history during this period should be recorded, and that the statistical tables which we now have up to 1857 should be brought down to the present day. There are, moreover, some points in which our present laws, or rather, let me say, our present customs, might, perhaps, be modified with advantage. Again, as when one of Her Majesty's ships is wrecked, it is usual to have a court-martial, so a suspension of the Bank Act may be said to afford sufficient ground for a Parliamentary inquiry. So far, therefore, I do not differ from the hon. Member for Glasgow, though unable to accept his Resolution. I do not wish, indeed, to lay any special stress on the appointment of a Committee rather than a Commission, although the former seems more convenient, and follows up the precedents of 1848 and 1858. It is, however, impossible for me to accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow, because I do not believe that the present system of currency is dangerous to commerce, or that fluctuations in the rate of interest can be prevented by Act of Parliament. It must be remembered that the Act of 1844, though called a Bank Act, is, in fact, only a Bank-note Act. It does not interfere in any way with the Bank as a Bank, but it limits the issue of bank-notes to a certain fixed sum, plus the amount of bullion. The main object was to secure the convertibility of the note, and it has done so. In all other respects the Bank was left and is still perfectly free. Those who advocate what they call free banking often refer to the United States as a model. But in fact, while true banking—banking as opposed to the issuing of bank-notes—is perfectly free in Britain, this is not the case in the United States. On the contrary, in that country the law attempts to regulate, not only the currency, but the direct banking business of the so-called National Banks, and provides that they must hold a cash reserve of either 15 per cent., or, in the so-called "redemption cities," 25 per cent. of their total liabilities to the public. These limits have not, however, as a matter of fact, always been maintained, and last December the New York Banks infringed the law in this respect, their reserve being below the legal amount. I agree with a very able article in The Economist (7th December, 1872), that the system—banks, that it suffices to secure an ample reserve in the proper quarter."

But though banking proper is perfectly free in this country, the issue of notes is regulated by the Act of 1844, up to which time the Bank of England was left to exercise its own discretion. In considering the policy of the Act, it is very necessary to remember the history of our currency before 1844, and the events which induced Sir Robert Peel to propose the Bank Act. In 1797 the bullion in the Bank of England had almost run dry, and the directors communicated to Government their fear that they would be unable to meet their engagements. The Government replied by the Order in Council of the 26th of February suspending cash payments. The Act confirming this Order contemplated a resumption of cash payments in June of the same year; but, the fatal step having once been taken, the suspension was prolonged by subsequent Acts until the close of the war. Even then, however, the Bank was not in a position to resume cash payments, nor did this state of things cease until 1823. It must not, however, be supposed that this period was free from financial difficulties. On the contrary, in 1800-1 the commercial distress was very severe; in 1811 it was so great that Parliament authorized an advance to merchants of £6,000,000 against approved securities, in spite of which the failures were very numerous. From 1814 to 1816 was also a period of great depression, and in fact those who regard an inconvertible paper currency as a panacea for financial evils, would do well to study with care the history of this period. In 1825, within a year or two after the resumption of cash payments, the Bank of England was, in the words of Mr. Tooke, drained almost to exhaustion. It has been often stated that on this occasion the Bank was saved by the accidental preservation of a box containing £700,000 in £1 notes. At this period no less than 70 banks suspended in one month; a suspension due to panic, as was shown by the fact that many paid in full, and the whole on an average paid 17s. 6d. in the pound. In 1836 the bullion in the Bank of England was again very low, and in 1839 the Bank was driven to the expedient of raising £2,000,000 by drawing on Paris. This had, indeed, become necessary under the circumstances. Mr. Palmer,

Governor of the Bank, in his evidence before the Committee of that House, said:—

"The case of the year 1839 was one of positive necessity; the bullion in the Bank was reduced so very low, by the discredit that existed of the Bank itself upon the Continent of Europe, as to endanger specie payments, so that there would have been no alternative but suspending altogether making payments in specie if they had not resorted to public credit."

In short, the bullion in the Bank was allowed to fall to £1,000,000 in 1797, to £1,261,000 in 1825, to £3,831,000 in 1837, to £2,406,000 in 1839. Under these circumstances, some legislative enactments were obviously necessary, and the Bank Act was accordingly passed, since which time the bullion has never on any occasion fallen below £6,000,000. It may be said that the Bank of England would under any circumstances have kept up its supply of bullion. Such an opinion would not however, I think, be maintained by any one who had carefully considered the subject. I have great confidence in the judgment and prudence of the Bank Court; but the truth is that without the Act of 1844 it would be almost impossible for the Directors to maintain such large reserves as at present. There were times when these reserves would seem to all those who did not look far ahead to be extravagant and unnecessary. The Bank rate affects not only those who discount with the Bank itself, but a great variety of other transactions, and so many persons are interested in the matter that immense pressure is always brought on the Directors to reduce the rate as soon as it seems possible to do so. I need not, however, urge my own opinion on this point, but will refer to the conclusion of the Committee of this House in 1858, which reported that the true judgment of the Bank Court would, under any circumstances, lead the Directors to act as if the Act of 1844 was in existence—

"But yet it is not expedient to expose them to the influence of such a pressure as would inevitably be applied at such a time."

Nay, this was the opinion of the Bank itself. The Governor, Mr. Palmer, was asked before the Committee of 1858—

"Looking at the present views of the Bank Directors, and to the experience which they have now acquired, do you think it probable that if the Bank Act had not been enforced, they would still have been desirous to pursue precisely the same course as they have actually pursued in that respect."

"I think they would have been desirous to do so; but I am not sure that the influence of pressure from without might not have acted a little to warp their judgment." [Report on Bank Acts, 1858, p. 6.]

The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), who is so well qualified to speak on such a subject, has also expressed the same opinion, and I believe it is generally shared by those who have studied our financial history. If, then, we do not maintain the principle of the Act of 1844, we may depend upon it that in future panics we shall have no such stock of bullion to fall back on, and that no mere Treasury letter will be sufficient to avert a suspension of cash payments. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, among the accusations he has brought against the Act of 1844, attributes to that Act the effect of rendering the establishment of new banks impossible. With regard to England that can hardly be said to be the case, because some of the most important and flourishing of the existing banks have been established since the passing of the Act. It is true that this is not the case in Scotland, and the state of the Scotch circulation seems to me to be well worth the consideration of this House. It is however fair to admit that the fact is to a great extent due to the excellent management of the Scotch banks. Admitting, however, that the Act has secured the convertibility of the note, it may be said that this result however important, may be secured at too great a cost. What, then, are the objections generally brought against the Act of 1844? They are, firstly, that it creates panics; secondly, that it necessitates high rates; thirdly, that it causes great fluctuations in the rate of interest; and, fourthly, that it prescribes a fixed and rigid limit. It must be remembered, however, that there were panics before 1844, and that they are not confined to England. In the opinion of the Committees of this House which investigated all the circumstances, the panics of 1847 and 1857 were mainly caused by the numerous failures which then occurred, not the failures by the panics. The unsound state of trade in 1847 and 1857 was sufficiently proved by the condition of the houses which failed. Many persons are under the impression that sound and solvent houses were pulled down by those panics. The facts show this to be entirely an error. The average dividend paid by the firms which stopped did not amount to more than 4s. in the pound, which sufficiently proved that they were hopelessly insolvent. Mr. Coleman, the accountant, than whom no one was more competent to speak on such a subject, was asked before the Committee of 1858—

"Speaking generally with regard to 1847, of which your experience is now complete, are you prepared to say that the failures which occurred in that year were owing to any imperfection of the law by which the facilities for obtaining credit were unduly curtailed?"—"No."—"With regard to the year 1857, what would your answer be to the same question?"—"That every house which applied and deserved assistance received it."

Mr. Ball, another of the principal accountants in London, was asked whether in his opinion the result would have been advantageous either to those houses or to the public if they had been sustained, and he expressed his conviction that the longer this had been done, the greater would the ultimate loss have been; in confirmation of which it might be observed that the three great banks—the Western Bank of Scotland, the Liverpool Borough Bank, and the Northumberland and Durham Bank—as well as the two discount houses which failed in 1857, and the stoppage of which so much aggravated the panic, were all in difficulties in 1847, and were assisted by the Bank of England. I will now pass to the second objection—namely, that the high rates which were reached in 1847, 1857, and 1866 were caused by the Bank Act. But if so they would have been confined to this country. Now, in 1847, when our rate went up to 8 per cent, it was 7 per cent in New York, and on trade bills even 18 per cent; in Hamburg, again, it reached 7 per cent, though the Hamburg rates were generally below ours. In 1857, when our rate was 10 per cent, the Bank of France had also raised its rate to 10 per cent, and the rate at Hamburg was 9 per cent, and even at that rate there were only three or four houses whose bills were taken. In New York 62 out of 63 banks suspended; most of the banks in Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore did the same; and the rate of interest ranged from 18 to 24 per cent. In 1866, when our rate was 10, that of the Bank of Prussia was  $9\frac{1}{2}$ , while at New York the rate for short loans was 7 per cent, on good bills 7 to 8 per cent, and on ordinary trade bills from 10 to 18 per cent. It is true that the Bank of France rate was at that time 4 per cent; but that very fact showed the extent to which English paper was discredited. The French capitalists preferred to get 4 per cent for their money in France rather than discount English bills at 10 per cent. The third complaint against the Act of 1844 is that it has caused numerous and extreme changes in the rate of interest. I do not understand that the Act is supposed by the hon. Member to have made money dearer on the average, and such is certainly not the case. No doubt these fluctuations had of late years been more frequent than was formerly the case, but I believe that this is due more to the condition of commerce than to the action of the law. It seems to me a clear proof of this that for ten years succeeding the passing of the Act—from 1844 to 1854—there were only 25 changes in the rate of interest, or, on an average,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  a-year. It is no doubt true that latterly they have been more numerous. Last year they had 14 changes, while the Bank of France only altered once—namely, on the 1st of March, when the rate was lowered from 6 per cent to 5 per cent. Our rates, on the contrary, varied from 3 per cent to 7 per cent. The fact is, however, that the conditions of the Paris money market are so different from ours that any comparison for such a purpose must be unsatisfactory. New York is a much more apposite case, and those who wish for a change in our system of currency generally point to America as a model. Now, in New York last year the rate of interest on first-class bills altered 23 times in the year, and varied from  $5\frac{1}{2}$  to 12 per cent. Thus, while the difference here between the extremes, even last year, was 4 per cent, that in New York was  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The contrast between London and New York is still more marked if we take the rates on money loaned from day to day. In London the rates allowed for money at call vary from 2 to 5 per cent. But in New York the rates charged on loans from day to day vary from a minimum of 3 per cent to a maximum of 7 per cent and  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent commission, thus bringing the rate up to 40 or even 50 per cent per annum. Surely, then, it is obvious that it would be an entire mistake to suppose that the adoption of the American system would prevent fluctuations, and periods of pressure in the money market. I am sure, however, that everyone who is conversant with the subject will agree with me when I say that, Bank Act or no Bank Act, if the Bank of England wish to retain its business it must follow the market rate of interest. The Bank of England is often said to fix the rate of interest, just as Britannia is said to rule the waves. We cannot however prevent storms in the money market any more than we can level the waves of the ocean; and last year, if the Bank of England had attempted to maintain a uniform rate of interest, she would at one period have been deprived of all her discount business, and at another have lost all her reserve. Lastly, some persons have objected to the Act of 1844 because it contains a fixed and rigid limit, but this is an objection not so much to the Act as to the nature of things. Before 1844 there was a limit just as there is now; then the reserve of the Bank of England was in gold, now it is in notes; but it was as much fixed in the one case as in the other. There is, however, this important difference—that the present limit can be altered by a stroke of the pen, as we have always a large stock of bullion in reserve. The three panic years of 1847, 1857, and 1866, so far from being periods when the Act broke down, were precisely the times when it proved most useful. The reserve which was intended to maintain the convertibility of the note, was temporarily used to support public credit. In the three years just mentioned the reserve fell to a very low point. The Act of 1844, however, had kept for us, beyond the Bank reserve, a stock of bullion which proved most useful. It is all very well to say that if it had not been for the Act, the bullion would have been available, and there would have been no cause for panic; but the truth is that, but for the Act, the Bank of England would not have held that stock of bullion. Many of those who oppose the Act seem to suppose that panics are confined to this country. Panics at home naturally produce more impression on us than those which occur elsewhere; but it would be a great mistake to suppose that periods of difficulty have been peculiar to England. On the contrary, they occur wherever trade is complicated and extensive. Take the case of America. During the autumn of 1814 all the Banks south and west of New England suspended specie payments. From the 1st of January, 1811, to the 1st of July, 1830, 165 Banks in the United States suspended operations. In 1825 the rate of interest in New York was from 12 to 36 per cent, and, as stated in a Boston paper of that date—"the merchants cracked like parched corn." In 1837 every Bank in the United States stopped payment, and I have already shown that since 1844 America has not been more free from financial difficulties than we have. There is, however, one way in which our system of currency differs materially from one entirely metallic. Bank notes are much more easily and safely carried about and locked up than the gold they represent, and timid persons during a panic may, under present circumstances, at once withdraw their deposits and lock up the notes. Notes can also be easily sent by post, and if they are cut in halves the risk and trouble of adopting that course are almost inappreciable. But with sovereigns themselves the case is different. There is not only great danger of robbery, but a large sum in sovereigns is both heavy and bulky. During the panic of 1825 a poor woman went to Williams's Bank in the West of England, changed a number of notes for gold, and set out with a mind much relieved to walk home. But though her heart was light her pockets were heavy, and before she had got half way she began to repent what she had done, and feeling very tired, sat down to rest and count her treasure. While she was doing so a butcher boy came by, and at once seeing the state of the case, informed her, with that ready wit which characterises butcher boys, that he was sorry for her, for she evidently did not know that the Sovereign Bank in London had stopped payment. The story adds that she jumped up, hurried back to the Bank, and, after abusing the astonished cashier, insisted on having back her notes. It is obvious that while to draw a balance of £10,000 in 10 notes of £1,000 each was an affair of seconds, to carry off 10,000 sovereigns is a much more serious matter. Many writers on these subjects have assumed that in panics cheques become comparatively useless, and that thus a greatly increased amount of notes is required. I believe that to be a mistake, and that in a panic creditors are glad enough to get a cheque. The increase in the circulation arises, I believe, from the natural wish on the part of Banks, and especially those at a distance from London, to keep strong at such times. I hope that in any future period of pressure the Bank Directors and other bankers, while raising the rate, will, as far as possible, avoid giving rise to an impression that they refuse to discount any good "business" bills. Nothing, I believe, would tend more to prevent panics than the feeling that, at the current rate, good bills would be negotiable. If that were the case, the public would present for discount as few bills as possible, whereas in the late panics they often discounted much more than was necessary, under the apprehension that if they waited they might not be able to discount at all. Still, we should indeed be blind to the lessons of the past if we hoped to avoid difficulties in the future. No law, I might almost add no prudence, could obviate the possibility of panics. Moreover, there is a certain amount of uneasiness in the City on account of the views attributed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and especially to his remark that the City must take care of itself. I am sure, however, that my right hon. Friend did not use this expression in an unfriendly spirit. I accept it rather as a tribute to the prudence of those by whom our banking and commercial institutions are conducted. As regards the body to which I have the honour to belong, on the very worst day of the panic in 1857, the London bankers had £5,500,000 deposited at the Bank of England, in addition to their reserves in their own tills. It must then be admitted that they had acted with prudence and forethought. Moreover, it must always be remembered that the pressure in the money-market in 1847, 1857, and 1866, as the published Returns fully prove, arose, not from any withdrawal of the deposits from the Banks, but from an entirely abnormal and extraordinary demand for loans and discounts on the part of the public. It is one thing to hold a sufficient reserve to meet any demands which can be made for deposits, but the calls for loans and discounts cannot be foreseen. Moreover, though the minimum amount of notes which can ever be in circulation may be estimated with certainty, it is impossible to foresee the maximum which may be required. So far as any gradual increase is concerned, the case is met by the provisions of the Act, but it is different with any sudden demand for notes, such as occurred, for instance, in May, 1866, when the amount in circulation rose from £22,300,000 to £26,100,000 in one week. What then would happen if we had a repetition of such a state of things as that which occurred in 1857—which I take in preference to 1866, because the facts of the latter year are not fully known to us? On the 12th of November, 1857, the reserve of the Bank of England consisted of £450,000 in coin and £131,000 in notes, while the deposits of the London bankers with the Bank of England amounted to £5,458,000. Under these circumstances, the Treasury wrote a letter stating that, should the Bank exceed the authorised issue of notes, the Government would bring in a Bill of Indemnity. It must be remembered that this letter did not alter the legal position of the Bank. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has no authority to suspend the Bank Act. No doubt it would always be satisfactory to the Bank Directors to know that they were acting with the concurrence of Government, but that does not affect their responsibility in law. It seems, however, to have been generally supposed that in the absence of such a letter the Bank of England and other bankers would have been compelled to cease discounting, and would thus have saved themselves at the expense of the mercantile community. This idea has caused, no doubt, a difference between the currency panics before and after 1844. In earlier times solvent houses feared for the Bank; latterly they have trembled for themselves. I believe, however, that their fear was groundless. The truth is that the Bank cannot, under such circumstances, suddenly cease to discount. The proper course is to act on the exchanges by timely precautions; but if the Bank cease to discount, the result will be that it will lose more by the panic which it will produce, the hoarding of notes, and the withdrawal of deposits, than it will save by the diminution of advances.

Under such circumstances, then, what can the Governor of the Bank do? The Bank must honestly endeavour to conform to the Act; but, if a sudden emergency arise, they must do their best, and, if necessary, come to that House for an indemnity. The Act of 1844 is intended to regulate the Bank, not to break it. It must be remembered that the Bank does not hold it as trustee for the note-holders. The object of the Act was no doubt to regulate the issue, but it does not give the note-holders any special claim on the bullion. In a liquidation, they would rank with the depositors. Under the circumstances, therefore, while on the one hand the Bank ought not to over-issue notes, neither on the other ought they to refuse the cheques of depositors as long as they have funds. They must therefore choose the lesser of two evils. Whether they are responsible for the position, or whether it was due to circumstances beyond their control, is, of course, another question. The Governor who sanctions an over-issue of notes, whether with a Treasury letter or not, no doubt incurs a grave responsibility; but it would be far graver to close the doors of the Bank; that is a responsibility which I believe no Governor of the Bank would take upon himself. In certain contingencies, then, it seems—and Parliament has sanctioned the belief—that the Directors of the Bank of England would be compelled to extend the issue of notes beyond the limit contemplated by the Act of 1844. I confess, however, that I should be reluctant to entrust to them a legal power such as is indicated in the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, because I think that such a course may lead to an over-issue without sufficient reason. If then, these views are correct, solvent houses have no cause to regard the Act of 1844 with apprehension. As a matter of fact, even in the worst days of 1847, 1857, and 1866, good bills could always be discounted. I trust that no suspension of the Act may again be found necessary. At any rate, while we must no doubt expect times of difficulty, and periods of pressure in the future, still as long as the Act of 1844 is maintained on the statute book, we shall always have a supply of bullion in reserve sufficient to carry the country through any momentary panic. It is, of course, unde-nial that the fluctuations in the rate of interest have been greater since 1844 than they were before, but so have those in commerce itself. In 1819 our exports were £65,000,000, and in 1844 they were £144,000,000, showing an increase of £79,000,000 in 24 years; but in 1872 they were £608,000,000, being an increase in the 27 years since the Act was passed of no less than £464,000,000. Taking the amounts which passed through the Clearing House on the 4th of the month in 1839, they were £1,200,000 on an average; the figures were not again ascertained till 1868, but the amount now averages more than £22,000,000. The amount which passed through the Clearing House in 1839 was under £1,000,000,000. It is true that this amount does not include the joint stock Banks, but if we allow another £500,000,000 on this account we shall probably be beyond the mark. After that the figures were not taken till 1867, when they were £3,260,000,000. Last year they amounted in round numbers to £5,360,000,000, and this year they will probably exceed £6,000,000,000. Surely, with these facts before us, it cannot be said that the Bank Act has prevented the development of our commerce? While, then, I hope that Her Majesty's Government will grant a Committee, so that the financial history of the country since 1857 may be put on record and some improvements introduced, I cannot agree to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Glasgow, and I beg, therefore, to move the Amendment which stands in my name. I am anxious that the financial history of the last few years should be inquired into, and while I believe that in some points our present financial arrangements might be improved, I feel the utmost confidence that, while willing to make any changes which can be shown to be desirable, the House will not consent to tamper with the firm basis of our currency, or to abandon the main principle of a system under which our commerce has attained a magnitude and prosperity unsurpassed and unparalleled in the history of the world.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Bank Act of 1844, and of the Bank Acts for Ireland and Scotland of 1845,"—(Sir John Lubbock.)

—instead thereof.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he could not agree with the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), chiefly for the reason which had been given by the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock)—namely, because he did not think that the present system of currency was dangerous to the commerce of the country, or that any change was necessary to prevent such extreme fluctuations in the discount rate as had been frequent since the passing of the Bank Act of 1844. Hon. Members should keep clearly before their minds what the law could do and what it could not do. The law could separate issue from banking, taking care that the money issued in bank notes was duly secured, so as to be really money, and leaving banking free. Now, he asserted that the Act of 1844 did what was required. By it the note was duly secured, so that a £5 note was what it professed to be; and, at the same time, banking was free, except, perhaps, in Scotland—a case that should be inquired into. Let the House consider the progress of banking in the last 30 or 40 years. During that time the bank note had almost receded into insignificance, when compared with banking deposits. He believed he was correct in saying that the circulation of notes was larger in 1819 than in 1872, which was a very remarkable fact, when considered in connection with the increase in our trade in that period. He would ask the attention of the House to the figures. Take first the exports and imports. The amount being represented by the figure 65 in 1819, would be represented by 608 in 1872. The clearing returns were even more astonishing. The amount of the clearing in 1844 was 40 times the total note circulation; in 1868, 87 times; in 1869, 90 times; in 1870, 97 times; in 1871, 113 times; and in 1872, 135 times. But the actual figures of the clearing for the present year would make the matter still plainer. Take a few weeks. In the week ending January 8th, the total clearing was £114,000,000; for the week ending January 15th, £145,000,000; for the week ending January 29th, £103,000,000; for the week ending February 5th, £149,000,000; for the week ending February 26th, £100,000,000; and for the week ending March 5th, £161,000,000. But this was not all. Mr. Inglis Palgrave had lately made an estimate of the total amount of the banking deposits of the Empire, and, though only an estimate, it might, he thought, be safely depended on. The figures were certainly astounding—

Average deposits of Bank of England £25,500,000
Circulation not covered by bullion . 10,000,000
Liabilities of London

Banks . . . . . 74,000,000
English Provincial ditto 210,000,000

Less estimated capital . . . 54,000,000

330,000,000

Two-fifths of deposits of discount houses . . . . . 32,000,000

Scotch Banks, including circulation 80,000,000

Ditto, Irish . . . . . 34,500,000

15 per cent of liabilities of Foreign and Colonial Banks (120,000,000) 18,000,000

Savings Banks . . . . . 50,000,000

Total liabilities . . . £580,000,000

And, now, what was the amount of reserve held against this enormous liability, according to Mr. Palgrave's estimate? He was sorry to say that it was only £24,000,000. Nor was this all. It might fairly be said that the only great reserve in the country was the reserve of the Bank of England, and a large part of that reserve consisted, in fact, of the reserves of other bankers deposited by them with the Bank. Now, under these circumstances when the reserve of actual cash was so small, and the possible and probable demands on it so large, who could wonder at great fluctuations in the rate of discount? That little bit of money, under those circumstances, became so extremely valuable that its worth could hardly be measured when men felt that they must have it whatever they had to pay for it. He wished to ask the hon. Member for Glasgow whether it was possible for any modification in the law of the country to alter this condition of affairs. The present system had grown out of the exigencies of the commercial classes, and a system of bills, cheques, and notes had been invented in order to meet the conveniences of trade. Such a system, of course, had its drawbacks, and the people had to pay the penalty when the day of panic arrived. That which he thought the law could do, and did do, was to give timely warning by acting on the Bank reserves. He could not illustrate this point better than by quoting a few words from Lord Overstone's evidence before the Committee of that House, in 1857—

"Previous to the Act of 1844, as bullion went out, the place of that bullion was taken by paper notes issued. The consequence of that was that the circulation—in other words, the money of this country—was kept at an undiminished amount when the action of the exchanges required the decrease of it. . . . Under the Act of 1844, we now all know that as the bullion goes out, either the notes which are not in the Bank till, or the notes which are in the Bank till, must undergo a corresponding decrease; and, that being the case, the corrective influence on the action of the Bank, and upon the feeling of the public, is brought into play at the very commencement of the evil."—[Lord Overstone's evidence in Report on Bank Acts, 1857, p. 332.]

He believed the noble Lord was right. The Act gave warning in time, and in ordinary times the warning was taken. The Bank raised its rate and public opinion supported the Bank in so doing, which it would not do but for the information afforded by the system adopted by the Act. Raising the rate without apparent reason was very unpopular, and the reason would not be apparent under the old system until it was too late to do any good. But it was said we we have to deal with panics, and the Act does not work well in times of panic. The hon. Member behind him seemed to have forgotten that panics were not the invention of the Act of Parliament. They existed in even greater intensity previous to 1844, for anyone who recollected the panic of 1825 looked back to it as one of the most hideous periods that ever existed. In 1837 the Bank was in the position of having neither notes nor gold; but since 1844 there were large reserves of bullion, whatever might be the demands upon it, and thus the Act enabled the Bank to assist commerce. In America, where there was free banking with a vengeance, the panics were far worse than anything of which we had experience in this country. The Bank of England had had three experiences of the peculiar position of which he was speaking, and there was no doubt the remedy invented by what was called the Government letter was perfectly effective. But this remedy was said to be unsatisfactory. He did not assert that it was satisfactory, but the question was whether or not a better remedy could be proposed. He would like to read another extract from the evidence of Lord Overstone, which showed that, although he was averse to the relaxation of the Act, he thought that the case of panics required exceptional treatment. He said—

"The principle of the Act is to regulate and control all those actions upon the bullion which arise from legitimate causes, and are capable of being controlled by measures which rest upon principle. But there may be actions upon the state of the circulation arising from accidental causes, as panic, and therefore not controllable by principle, which the Act cannot regulate, and which must, therefore, if they run to an excessive extent, be reached by some extraordinary power."—[Lord Overstone's Tracts, 1837-1857, p. 537.]

"Your Committee think that such a provision could not be regarded as any violation of the principle of the Act of 1844. To have introduced such an express provision when the law itself was first adopted by Parliament, or even when, as in 1848, it had only been a few years in operation, and was comparatively little understood, was a far more serious question of policy and of prudence than it can in fairness be considered at the present time. Yet the interference of Government in an extreme case must, in fact, be taken to have been contemplated by the framers of that Act."—[Committee of 1858, p. 27.]

Now, the real question was whether we were to trust to the discretion of a Ministry going against the law as it were, or, whether it would not be far better to have the provision a part of the law, so that the law should not be periodically broken. He thought it most dangerous to proceed on the supposition that we were to have no more panics. That mistake was made in 1857. Everything was at that time said to be in a most satisfactory state, though the country was on the eve of a great disaster. A similar mistake occurred in 1866. Some gentlemen then made speeches in public or quasi public places in which they declared that the era of panics was at an end. One hon. Member of the House made a statement to that effect than whom no one had access to better sources of information. All, however, were equally in error, and the danger, he would remind the House, was increasing, because while our deposits continued to grow larger our reserves did not proportionally augment. There was a want of elasticity in the Act of Parliament, which did not meet the case, and, that being so, he thought it might be a fair subject for inquiry whether some plan could not be invented by means of which the necessary relaxation, for it must come, could be given by and not against law. It was, in his opinion, a most unsatisfactory state of things that we should have the people of this country expecting the law to be broken. The law should be so arranged as to be applicable to foul weather as well as to fair. He had no objection, therefore, to inquiry, but he wished the inquiry to be instituted into the whole question, without the House committing itself to anything which was unsound. No hon. Member would, he hoped, give way to the idea that we should get rid of panics. Nothing could be more fatal to a sound conclusion than any idea of the kind. It was, in his opinion, failures which caused panics, and not panics which caused failures. It was a rare thing, he believed, for any man to fail except as the result of his own imprudence, as for instance, in locking up his assets in the wrong sort of securities. We had, however, the same state of things over and over again, and there was no use in assuming that it would not return. He was even afraid that we should have worse panics than those which we had already experienced, in the time to come. He therefore entreated the House, if it resolved to inquire into the question, to inquire into the whole matter thoroughly, and not to expect that it could make money cheap by Act of Parliament, or prevent the consequences of imprudence.

Mr. J. B. SMITH said, that previous to the Act of 1844 the Bank of England were allowed to issue notes ad libitum. The Bank laid down a rule that it ought to keep a reserve in gold equal to one-third of its liabilities; but it continually broke that rule, and often the Bank was left with scarcely any reserve of gold at all. At last the reserve was reduced to about £1,000,000, with some 30,000,000 of deposits, and if it had not been for the kindness of the Bank of France in making advances of gold to the Bank, in all probability it must have suspended payment of its notes. The Act of 1844 was passed to preserve us from that humiliation, and it had most effectually succeeded. Nobody doubted that since that period bank-notes could at any time be exchanged for gold, but the Act of 1844 made no other change. The Bank was not allowed to issue notes beyond £15,000,000 except upon deposits of gold, and, consequently, there was a security that its notes could always be converted into gold. But in separating the issue from the other department of the Bank, the Bank, like any other joint-stock Bank, was at liberty to carry on its business as it pleased; and the result had been that it had carried it on just as before—heedless of its principles. The Bank professed to keep a reserve of cash equal to one-third of its liabilities; but in 1847, instead of having 33 per cent, it had only 11 per cent of reserve; in November, 1857, it had only 7½ per cent; and in 1866 only 4½ per cent of reserve. In times gone by the Bank of England was able to govern the money market; but a new state of things had arisen, large joint-stock Banks had sprung up with larger deposits than those of the Bank of England, and things had changed the course. In 1866, three of the joint-stock Banks of London held 60,000,000 of deposits, while the Bank of England had only 29,000,000. It was the large amount of deposits, and not the capital of the Banks, that ruled the money-market; yet at that time—June, 1866—the Bank of England had only £4,000,000 of cash in hand, and that included the cash on hand of the joint-stock Banks. Thus there were £39,000,000 of liabilities, and only £4,000,000 of reserve to meet them, being 4½ instead of 33 per cent of the liabilities. Remembering that state of things, it was not surprising that he should find on taking up The Daily News of that day, a paragraph to the effect that uneasiness prevailed in the money-market because £600,000 in gold had been taken from the Bank, and it was expected that the rate of discount on Friday would be raised. Since 1866 the power of the joint-stock Banks had so much increased that they now ruled the Bank of England. There was no other remedy for constant panics and fluctuations in the money-market, except keeping an adequate reserve. In a country like this, where almost all the payments of the world were balanced, they must necessarily have great fluctuations from time to time; and the only way to prevent inconvenience arising from them was to have such a reserve as that a drain of 3,000,000, 4,000,000, 5,000,000, or even 10,000,000 of gold would have no effect upon the market. In 1866 while panic was raging here, no panics occurred in America or France, because of the sound condition of the banks in those countries. The Bank of France had at that time 60,000,000 of liabilities, and 26,000,000 of cash in hand, and, there, a drain of 3,000,000 or 4,000,000, which in this country created a panic, would not have been felt, because they held 44 per cent of their liabilities in gold. The Banks of New York had 17,000,000 of cash against 46,000,000 of liabilities, or 39 per cent; the Banks in Boston held 36 per cent of reserves, and the Banks of Philadelphia a reserve of 48 per cent; while the Bank of England and the three London joint-stock Banks to which he had referred had only 4½ per cent of reserve against £89,000,000 of liabilities. Such a state of things accounted at once for our difficulties, and the constant changes in the rate of discount. One of the most desirable measures to adopt would be to simplify the accounts of the Bank of England by relieving it altogether from the issue of notes, and to transfer the issue to the Government. He had been glad to hear from the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) that the issue department was of little importance to the Bank, which made little profit by it, and no doubt the Bank would, therefore, be ready to resign it to the Government. The proposed inquiry should embrace the whole question, and they must not omit to take into consideration the joint-stock Banks, which no doubt had now about 100,000,000 of deposits, while the Bank of England had perhaps about 30,000,000; and although the Bank of England at present held about £15,000,000 in reserve, that was only 10 per cent of the liabilities of these Banks. In 1865-6, while the whole mercantile community were losing so much money, the joint-stock Banks were realizing 10 per cent interest on their deposits, and were thus in the half year ending the 30th of June, 1866, enabled to make dividends, one at the rate of 25 per cent, another at 29 per cent, and another at 50 per cent per annum; that was done at the expense of the mercantile community.

He joined in the demand for the proposed inquiry, and he trusted that it would be of a full, complete, and searching character.

Mr. NORWOOD said, he was convinced that the feeling of the country was in favour of a searching inquiry into our currency system. The fact that the Act of 1844 had required suspension in 1847, 1857, and 1866, owing to crises from which the trading and labouring classes had severely suffered, did not tend to show that it was a satisfactory measure. Moreover, the circumstances of the country had materially changed since 1844, for in that year our imports amounted to £75,449,000, and our exports to £58,584,000, a total of £134,033,000, whereas in 1872 the figures were £353,376,000 and £255,962,000, a total of £609,338,000. In 1844, too, the private deposits in the Bank of England amounted to £8,000,000, and those in five leading joint-stock Banks to £8,000,000; while on the 31st December, 1872 the private deposits of the Bank of England were £21,481,000, and four joint-stock Banks held £79,350,000—namely, the London and Westminster, £28,660,000; the London Joint Stock, £18,540,000; the Union, £15,180,000; and the London and County, £16,970,000. And notwithstanding that the foreign and internal trade of the country had thus enormously increased, the circulation of notes upon which our currency was based had remained nearly stationary. He agreed with the principle laid down by the Prime Minister in his speech of 31st July, 1866, in which he said—

"The whole business of issue is the business of the State. The profit of issues belongs to the State, and what is much more important, the responsibility of issues also belongs to the State."

And in the judgment of many well qualified to offer an opinion, the period had arrived when the Government should take over into their own hands the issue and regulation of our paper currency.

Mr. CRAWFORD, having heard the speeches of the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) and the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), was satisfied to rely for defence of the Bank Act of 1844, and the manner in which the Bank of England had administered it, on the statements made by those hon. Gentlemen. He had listened with interest to the able and convincing speech of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson); able because it contained more financial heresies and economical fallacies than he had ever heard propounded in an equal space of time, and convincing because it had convinced him that the opinions he had hitherto held were correct. He should like the hon. Gentleman to define what he meant by the expression that there should be a "free price for gold." The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) had alluded to the peculiar part which joint-stock Banks took in the monetary transactions of the present day, and it was true that those Banks and the Bank of England held in deposit a large amount of money belonging to other people; but he could not see why the hon. Member should have mixed up the other Banks with the Bank of England, considering the totally different position in which they stood from that occupied by the Bank of England. The London and Westminster Bank had a capital of not more than £2,000,000, and had £28,000,000 deposits, while the Bank of England had a capital of £14,000,000 and had £21,000,000 deposits. Why the former with a limited capital could pay so large a dividend was therefore obvious. As to the complaint that the Bank of England held no reserve adequate to its liabilities, it had for some time had 45 per cent of its liabilities in hand. The probability of a rise in the rate of discount on account of the export of gold had been spoken of; but it was a deduction which anybody could draw, that if the export went on the value of money would rise, and the Bank would be bound to raise the rate of discount. The movements of gold were, he must say, made too much of at the present time. There was too great a tendency on the part of public writers to alarm the public mind as to what might be expected to happen. It was quite sufficient for those who had the responsibility of determining what, in their opinion, was the proper thing to do, and what the proper time to do it, without the public mind being alarmed from day to day by prognostications as to what might be the result of such and such a course. His hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) had spoken of three suspensions of the Bank Act. He should remind the House that the Act had only been broken, so to say, once. On two occasions the Government had authorized the Bank to go beyond their regulated and legal amount of issue, but only on one occasion had the Bank any necessity to do so. The fact, when it became known out of doors, that the Bank would be able to find notes for all persons who had security to offer, at a price, was quite sufficient to put a stop to all feeling of uneasiness as to the customers of the Bank being able to obtain whatever they might require. He quite concurred in the observations of his hon. Friends the Members for Maidstone and Cambridge that failures were produced by panics and not panics by failures. For his part, he could only name one single instance when throughout the entire panic persons having security were not able to obtain money. On that "Black Friday" there might have been, perhaps, some difficulty, but it was got rid of when it was known that the Government letter was coming, in consequence of which the assistance required could be obtained. It should be borne in mind that during a panic they had not to deal with reasonable and reasoning people. It would be found as difficult to control a herd of wild animals as to render amenable to reason people who had got exaggerated ideas into their heads under the influence of panic. His hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge had given Notice of his intention to propose an Amendment to the effect that a power of relaxation should be vested in the Government, and he confessed that he saw no sufficient reason why they should not be intrusted with such a power. If it were known that such a power existed to increase the amount of accommodation to the public—subject to the operation of a high rate of discount, and with the check of public opinion and responsibility to Parliament—the result could not but be beneficial. He was aware that when the Act was under discussion Sir Robert Peel had in his mind some idea of proposing to give the Government a power of relaxation in the official discretion of the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the President of the Board of Trade, although the idea was not carried out. He could not help thinking that the circumstances under which the Bank Act was considered in 1844 and the circumstances of the present day were essentially different.

Then the principles of the Act had not been tried or tested. Now, after a lapse of 30 years, they had had considerable experience of its operation. It was apprehended that the Government or the Bank would give way too readily to pressure; but it had been shown that there was no ground for such an apprehension. On the whole he was clearly of opinion that much good would result from the granting to the Government of power, under circumstances to be defined, and with the checks to which he had alluded, to enable the Bank to exceed its legal amount of issue. With respect to the inquiry which was asked for, he could only say for himself, and he was sure he might say also for every gentleman with whom he was associated in the administration of the affairs of the Bank of England, that while they saw no necessity whatever for inquiry, all the information sought for being at the disposal of the House, they would interpose no objection whatever in its way. They were ready to come and state all that had occurred in the course of their administration as to which the public had a fair title to information, and that would, of course, have no relation to the private affairs of their customers. They and the officers who represented them were perfectly ready to give evidence as to the working of the Act and the manner in which their duties had been fulfilled in reference to the issues of the Bank. There remained the question whether, if the Government granted the inquiry, as to which he knew nothing, it should be by a Committee or by Royal Commission. For his part, he preferred a Committee of their own to a Commission of which, after its appointment, they might hear again in two or three years. If a Committee were intrusted with the inquiry, he hoped it would be presided over by some person in whom the House had full confidence, and consist entirely of men who had no strong predilections of their own. He did not regret the discussion which had occurred, and he believed that neither the Bank nor the Act, as to its principles, could in the least degree suffer from the most searching inquiry.

Mr. R. N. PHILIPS said, he wished to say a word as to the operation of the Bank Act upon the manufacturing interest of the public. On the whole, he was inclined to think that the result of the change made in 1844 had been beneficial to those interests. He hoped that the result of any inquiry which might be instituted would not be to place the commercial affairs of the country more under the influence of the Government. His hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) had found fault with the mode in which the Bank Act had been suspended. In point of fact, the Act had been rescinded, not at the request of the Directors of the Bank, but at the instance of bill brokers in the City, who had brought pressure to bear upon the Bank and upon the Government. He believed that to the step thus taken might be traced much of the difficulties and evils which had since been experienced in the mercantile world. Inquiry might very properly be instituted upon one point. The Bank of England had the privilege of issuing £14,000,000 of notes above bullion, and this privilege was given in acknowledgement of services rendered to the Government. A far more straightforward course would be for the Government to pay the Bank for whatever service it had rendered, and for the Legislature to forbid the issue of notes in any degree beyond the amount of bullion in the Bank. He agreed with the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) in preferring a Committee of the House to a Royal Commission.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had listened to the discussion upon this question with great pleasure, because he gathered from the views expressed that the House had no wish to interfere with or alter the main principles of the Act of 1844. Such a declaration, supported as it had been by such admirable reasoning, was not only an intellectual treat, but of real solid advantage to the commercial and free institutions of the country. It would be strange if it were not so. But he wished to say a few words on the Act, notwithstanding the approbation it had received, just to point out the practice with regard to it. Whenever any evil occurred in the mercantile world people who had anything to complain of immediately flew at the Act of 1844, without troubling themselves to establish a link between the Act and their trouble. The Act of 1844 had been much misrepresented and misunderstood, but it was exceedingly simple. It rested on a metallic basis. All exchange transactions of mankind ultimately resolved themselves into bargains, and the man who undertook to make a payment really undertook to deliver a certain quantity of precious metal at the proper time. That quantity might fluctuate in value—that was inevitable in the nature of things—but the quantity in each bargain was fixed, and ought not to be departed from. All honest commercial transactions rested on that principle, and it was the duty of the Government to maintain it without deviation. The Act of 1844 embodied it. The object of the Act was to manipulate a mixed currency of gold and paper so that whether the token of exchange were gold or paper it should represent the same value as if the entire currency were metallic. That being so, all that reasonable people could expect from the Act was that it should do at the most what metallic currency could do, and that was what the Act had done. Assuming the desire of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) attained, he would say of the metallic currency, as he had said of the Act of 1844, that it was the cause of all the fluctuations in discounts. Assuming also that the hon. Member had established this, what more would he have shown than that it was the pleasure of mankind to select as means of payment and measure something which in its nature was exceedingly liable to fluctuation? He would not have shown there was anything wrong in such a state of things, or that it was in the power of man to correct it. He would have shown only the nature of the substance in which contracts were made. How was it possible for the hon. Member to maintain that the Act had been the cause of all the fluctuations in discount? Did he assert that there were no fluctuations in gold? Of course he could not. There was nothing in the world more fluctuating than gold. Every circumstance of trade influenced its value. There were always a number of people wishing to dispose of it and a number wishing to obtain it. Commercial successes created a demand for it. War, discoveries, increased emigration, every movement in the complicated organization of mankind made a demand for it, and the electric telegraph spread the news of that demand throughout the kingdom, so that it was felt immediately in all quarters. These being the principles of the Bank Act, it was manifest that any attempt to substitute any other basis for mercantile transactions was to attempt to make the Government accessory to great dishonesty, because if a man contracted with another to receive a certain quantity of a certain metal, and in accordance with the wish of the hon. Member for Glasgow something else was substituted for that metal other than a piece of paper which was so managed as to bear exactly the same value as the metal, the man contracted with would be cheated. Instead of the contract being dissolved on the same terms as those on which it was made, it would be dissolved on other terms, and the Government would be the cause of the dishonour. Of all persons who should be anxious to preserve the stability of the standard of value, none should be more so than the representatives of large constituencies of work-people, because what could be more unreasonable than that when contracts had been made for labour the Government should alter the standard of value, and force upon the contractors obligations they had never undertaken, causing some to pay more, probably, and others to receive less than they undertook? The hon. Member proposed that any person possessed of a certain amount in Government securities should be allowed to issue notes to the amount of 80 per cent, paying 2 per cent in gold to the Government. What would be the value of such currency? That would depend on the wants of mankind. If such currency were issued by an individual according as his necessities dictated, without regard to the wants of the rest of the community, what guarantee had they that the currency would meet the wants of the community? All that would be certain was that the issue would go on to the full extent. Gold would go out of the country, and all the other evils would ensue which generally result from an extension of the currency. That being the state of the case, the question which had excited most attention in the House was, what ought to be done in case of a panic. It was very difficult to say—and for this reason, that the word “panic” presupposed the temporary absence of all reasonable laws and regulations. He was happy to say that “panic” was unknown in our military and naval services, and that it was only reserved for our mercantile service. And why? Our naval and military men had confidence in their courage, discipline, valour, and former success. They had a well-grounded confidence in their discipline and system of control, whereas he was sorry to say our mercantile transactions, at any rate, did not appear to rest on so solid a foundation. He would not enter into the causes of the panics. They had been clearly explained by several speakers, and particularly by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler.) They depended on the anxiety of people to make every penny they could, and on their being content to carry on the banking business of a great nation on exceedingly narrow and slippery foundations. The Banks of Deposit were an instance. The money deposited did a double duty. It formed the security of the depositor, and contributed towards the assets which the Bank had at its command. The money could do one or other of these things; it could not possibly do both. This represented a dangerous policy, and similar instances might be multiplied. The reserves of the Banks, for instance, were fearfully small, but that was a matter with which the Government had nothing to do; it was a matter for those who deposited in the Banks and those who conducted them. The fact was the conductors of the Banks had not self-denial enough to keep sufficient reserves to carry on the business that came to them. What, then, was the course he could reasonably suggest to the House to adopt? He did not think it would be desirable to enter into the inquiry recommended by the hon. Member for Glasgow. He, at least, would not vote for it, because he did not in the least believe that the Bank Act of 1844 had been the cause of the panics which had occurred in our monetary transactions. And as to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) it had certainly many things to recommend it, but the great difficulty in the way of that Amendment was the speech of his hon. Friend himself, because, while proposing a Committee of Inquiry into the Bank Acts in a very wide sense, he had demonstrated that there was hardly anything in those Acts which he was prepared to say was not right. And what would such a Committee, if appointed, have to do? Why, simply to record facts derived from experience of the working of the Acts. But the House of Commons would hardly be justified in appointing a Committee of this magnitude merely to record facts which had taken place. And as every speaker with only one exception had spoken in approbation of the Bank Acts, it would be a needless agitation of the public mind, which would be only unsettled and disturbed if the House were to grant an inquiry which in its form would embrace even the question whether the monetary system of this country was to be carried on upon a metallic basis or not, when they were all agreed that the metallic basis was the right one, and that the Act of 1844 had stood the test of experience and had answered the purpose for which it was framed. He hoped, therefore, his hon. Friend would not persevere with his Amendment. There remained the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) which had attracted great consideration from the House, and it was only fair to say that a large amount of opinion had been expressed in favour of something in the nature of what his hon. Friend had suggested. There was a very general consensus of opinion that the subject was worthy of consideration. What he would therefore propose was that the House should decide nothing to-night, and that the Motion should be withdrawn; but he would undertake on behalf of the Government that they should consider, not the principle of the Act of 1844, but the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, and matters cognate to it, and would, after the Easter recess, make a communication to the House whether they thought it desirable to have a Committee to inquire into the subject or whether they would at once undertake to deal with it themselves. He hoped hon. Gentlemen would agree to that proposal. It would be extremely desirable that they should agree on this subject, and not go to a Division upon it.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, that, as there appeared to be an unanimous feeling on this subject, and as every speaker had arrived at the conclusion that some inquiry should be held, he trusted the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) would not accept the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

He would recommend the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) to withdraw his Motion. He had seconded it because he thought that an inquiry by Royal Commission would be better than any other form of inquiry. The speech of the hon. Member for Maidstone had proved too conclusively that there was no necessity at all for an inquiry; but in the gloss and brilliancy of the speech many of the serious defects of the Act of 1844 had been lost sight of. If the Government would resist the Motion for a Royal Commission, he trusted that a Committee of the House would be appointed to inquire into the working of the Act of 1844. Some of the oldest, soundest, and most experienced bankers in London and the country were most anxious for inquiry. The Chambers of Commerce which met a few weeks ago were urged by one of the soundest bankers in England to come to the Government for an inquiry on the subject. Not only the best men in Lombard Street, but the bankers and merchants throughout the country believed that there were serious defects in the working of the Act of 1844. In 1866 the Government of the day promised an inquiry into the whole question, and, after serious consideration such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to-night, the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), on a Motion by Mr. E. Watkin, stated that there was not one but there were many points which would need inquiry. Owing, however, to the illness or absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Committee was not appointed. He trusted the Government would at once consent to the Motion of the hon. Member for Maidstone.

Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had failed to appreciate the feeling of the House on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose that the object was limited to a single point—that of enabling the Government legally to suspend the Act of 1844 in case of panic. But something far beyond that was required. At all events, the feeling was that the matter had arrived at a point when it was ripe for investigation. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) had advocated inquiry on the ground that very great experience had been gained since the last investigation in 1858. Since then a great crisis had occurred in 1866, and in 1872 we were on the verge of a crisis probably averted by the operation of the Act. It was self-evident from the figures quoted by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) that the circumstances of our commercial finances were at this moment very different from what they were in 1844 or 1858. That hon. Gentleman stated that in 1844 the transactions in the Clearing House were 40 times greater than the note circulation, but that in 1872 they were 135 times greater. That was surely a remarkable fact. Did it not prove that the note circulation of the country was fractional and infinitesimal? Must there not be a large and wide question to consider besides merely the note circulation? He considered that the currency had very little to do with the rate of discount and value of money. When they had such a fact as that the transactions of the Clearing House amounted in one year to six thousand millions of money, and contrasted this enormous sum with the small amount of the actual currency, it was plain that the whole subject was far wider and deeper than was involved in a mere inquiry into the Bank Act. With the vast interests which were concerned, it was surely not too much to ask that a Committee of the House should be appointed to investigate this great question; and he infinitely preferred a Committee to a Commission. There was one point which ought not to be allowed to go forth to the world, and that was that the reserves of bankers were so small as they had been represented to be. Their cash and notes, though technically called their reserve, were really only a fractional portion of their reserves, which consisted in securities of all kinds, and amongst others the numerous bills drawn by commercial houses which they had in their coffers. It must not be supposed that these did not represent real value; they represented to a very large extent produce as valuable as gold, and it was to the effect which the small gold reserves of the Bank of England exerted on that vast circulation of commercial bills that the investigations of the Committee ought to be directed. He ventured earnestly to press on the consideration of the Government that they should grant the Committee so ably advocated by the hon.

Baronet the Member for Maidstone. They might also very properly introduce a simple amendment of the Bank Act which would enable them, under certain exceptional circumstances, to suspend it; but it would be a lame conclusion, indeed, to limit the inquiry simply to what Government should do in case of panic.

MR. WEGUELIN quite admitted that there was room for inquiry in regard to the banking system of the country. That was so vast a question that he doubted very much whether it was included in the terms either of the Motion or Amendment. The Act of 1844, as explained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, placed the currency on a basis that could not be shaken, but it left banking and the management of deposits entirely free. Whether that should be so was another question. Formerly the system of banking in the City of London was not to pay interest on deposits. That had been changed to a great extent. The joint-stock and other Banks now paid a large interest on deposits, and if they paid a high interest on deposits they must invest their deposits to a larger extent than formerly. That, of course, affected the reserves. The Government were prepared to deal with the only question as affecting the law of 1844 which, in his mind, was open to discussion. He should therefore be glad if to that extent his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) accepted the proposal of the Government. He did not wish at the present period of the Session and of the Parliament to embark on a more general inquiry of which he did not see the end.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a very fair offer to the House. For his own part, he was averse from an inquiry into monetary matters at the present time, as no good could result from it. Discussions of this kind were not unfrequently raised; but in his judgment it would be better if gentlemen, instead of talking about Banks and currency, would look to the manner in which their own business was conducted. The subject had been discussed this evening as if the Bank of England were everything in this country as regards money. Not unfrequently it happened that in one week something like £140,000,000 passed through the Clearing House, and what a small speck the Bank of England appeared when compared with that. The truth was that the rate of money was fixed, not by the Bank of England, but by the joint-stock and other Banks, and the Bank of England merely followed them. Over speculation caused the disasters which had been referred to, and he failed to perceive how any inquiry could prevent them. During the last two panics scarcely a single house had failed which ought not to have failed long before.

MR. GLADSTONE said, his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) had received much counsel from many friends and advisers, and he would add his mite to the store by giving his adhesion to what had been so emphatically and well said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of the Act of 1844. He trusted it would always be understood in the House that if the Government should be disposed at any time to make or entertain any proposal for further legislation on the subject-matter, it would not be in the way of impairing the Act; but by way of assuming it as the basis, and making it the point of departure, if necessary, for any arrangement which might appear likely to be advantageous in giving more thorough effect to the ideas upon which it was founded. Those who had advised his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone to refuse the offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done so on very different grounds. They had all in supporting his Motion emphatically repudiated his speech, and the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) admitted that it was impossible to support the Motion on the hon. Baronet's speech. The hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) went further, and would not be content with an inquiry into the Bank Act; but wished to extend the inquiry not only to the whole nature of currency, properly so called, but to monetary paper and all instruments of credit which were used as auxiliaries to transactions between man and man. The discussion might, then, be very well wound up. Some hon. Members had objected to the offer of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it was insufficient for the occasion; but he would say to them—"Wait and see what it is." The hon. Baronet could not possibly lose anything by accepting the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he would have the power of moving any Amendment he pleased to the Motion of his right hon. Friend. His hon. Friend, he hoped, clearly understood that what the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised was not only to take the subject into consideration, but to advocate a specific proposition, and within a limited time to come down to the House either to make a proposal or to offer an inquiry. In redeeming that pledge the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give the hon. Baronet ample opportunity for making any proposal, if that made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not meet his views. The hon. Baronet had no occasion to invite the House to deliver judgment, or to go to an issue on his Amendment. If he did so, he would go to an issue with allies who did not agree with his views except with reservations.

MR. LAING said, that as an earnest supporter of the Act of 1844, he trusted the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) would accept the offer made to him by the Government. The Act had survived far more serious attacks than the present. The Amendment was, in fact, an admission of weakness, if the result of the debate should be a sort of roving Committee or Commission for an inquiry into the whole of the question. It would be a serious thing for this country that this question should be considered an open one. The working of the Act had shown that in the main it had attained the object for which it was introduced. Still, however well it might work in ordinary times, occasions might arise, and did arise every 10 years or so, when some relaxation of the Act was necessary.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he was in the hands of the House, but after the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer he thought it was useless to press his Amendment. He trusted that the Government and the Bank of England would give the statistical information required.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that the Bank of England would be ready to give any Returns in continuation of those supplied to the former Committee.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had fully intended to withdraw his own Motion in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member (Sir John Lubbock), but he was rather precluded from doing so by the withdrawal of the Amendment. The hon. Baronet had done this without consulting those who were going to vote with him (Mr. Anderson). He was, however, in the hands of the House, and would, with its permission, withdraw his Motion.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that he had, on the contrary, as far as was possible, consulted those with whom he was acting. He had understood that the hon. Member was disposed to withdraw the Resolution and support his Amendment; but he did not consider that this committed him in any way.

MR. ANDERSON said, he certainly understood so.

BURIALS BILL.—[BILL 9.]

(Mr. Osborne Morgan, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice
Mr. Hadfield, Mr. McArthur.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN:* I rise, Sir, to move the second reading of this Bill; and, under ordinary circumstances, considering that this is the fourth year I have had the honour of moving it in this House, I should have been content to do so without comment; but the presence of an ex-Prime Minister—perhaps I should rather say of a future Prime Minister—to challenge the second reading of the Bill, after three years of unbroken silence, and after his absence from every one of the numerous and critical divisions which took place last year, is, I need not say, an occurrence of no ordinary character. Of course, it is not for me to speculate on the considerations which have induced so consummate a tactician to enter the lists with so unworthy an antagonist, or to impart to this question a party significance which I have always disclaimed. It may be that the right hon. Gentleman, with that keenness of perception which distinguishes him, has discovered that this is one of those “great and burning” questions which demand the interposition of a Parliamentary Divinity. Or it may be that he has resolved that the contest of the Irish University shall be renewed in the churchyard, and that the second great party battle of the Session shall be fought over the grave. It is not for me to grudge the right hon. Gentleman his laudable anxiety to pick up political capital out of the tombs, or to form a rallying ground for his party round the last resting places of the dead. The right hon. Gentleman has ere now come before us as the ill-starred champion of a waning cause, and if his defence of the Burial laws be no better than his defence of some other institutions which have now become matters of history, I shall have no cause for regret. The right hon. Gentleman, though a hard hitter, is a fair fighter, and my earnest hope is that this Bill will be fought out fairly, and will not be got rid of, as it was last year, by a process of mid-night strangulation. I should have been almost appalled by the opposition, and by the number of Petitions which have poured in against this Bill, were it not for one consoling fact. It seems to me that the very persons who have got up and signed the Petitions against the Bill have not taken the trouble to read it. The Bill has been denounced as a measure of spoliation and confiscation—no unfamiliar words—cunningly devised for the disestablishment, and not only the disestablishment, but for the disendowment of the Church of England. And yet the Bill touches no part of the revenues of the Church; the Bill touches no part of the property of the Church of England; the Bill invades no right of the Church of England except the barren—I had almost said the odious—right of claiming conformity for a corpse. I do not wish to be misunderstood. No doubt the parish churchyard is in some sense vested in the incumbent. He could resist trespass or intrusion, and his concurrence would be necessary to pass the legal estate in the fee simple. At the same time, these interests are vested in the clergyman not for his own use—not for his own personal occupation, but as a trustee. A trustee for the Church of England? For his own communicants? No such thing. It is vested in him as a trustee for the parish, and that in the largest and, if I may use the word, most secular sense. Every person who has gained a settlement in the parish, be he Jew, infidel, or heretic, has the same right of interment in the graveyard of his parish as the right hon. Gentleman or the most orthodox Churchmen who sit on those benches. The parishioners right to interment in England is a civil, and not an ecclesiastical right. If any Gentleman disputes that, I will refer him to Bishop Gibson's celebrated ecclesiastical treatise, where he will find the law laid down precisely as I have stated it. He will find that the parish church is as much parochial property as the parish vestry-hall or the parish pound. It is quite true that the Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Act, when it abolished church rates, did not provide any means for keeping the churchyard in repair. It always appeared to me that was an omission from that Act, and in the Bill which I originally introduced I provided that means should be supplied for keeping the churchyard and walls in decent repair—that there should be laid before the vestry an account of the expenses; and unless there was some other fund to provide the means, the overseers should, out of the rate made for the relief of the poor, repay to the churchwardens the money so expended by them. Who opposed that clause? Upon the first reading of that Bill the hon. Member for Cambridge, whom I am sorry not to see in his place, resisted the clause, and the clause was thrown out in Select Committee, I think, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Boston. And yet nearly every speech made against this Bill, nearly every article written against it, proceeds upon the supposition that the churchyards are the property of the Church, and that I am seeking to give outsiders rights which they did not possess before. Of course, I do not mean that lawyers take that view—lawyers like my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Mr. Cross), who is far too good a lawyer to put forward any such proposition. The hon. Gentleman put his case in a different way. He says that the churchyard is the property of the parish in the same way as the church in a certain sense is said to be the property of the parish, and he contends that the right of entry implies in each case an obligation to conform to the Church services. But just observe the want of analogy between the two cases. In the first place, it is a question for a man's own consideration whether he will go to church at all. He may go to a neighbouring chapel, or he may remain at home. But, unfortunately, a man has no option as to being buried or not, and in the 12,000 and odd parishes in England in which no other burial-grounds exist, he has no option as to the place in which he will be buried. That I think must be obvious. But the fallacy will become clearer if we ask ourselves upon what test does the right of the clergyman to insist upon reading the burial service depend? Is it communion with the Church? It is no such thing. Is it attendance at church on the part of the deceased? It is no such thing. The ceremony of baptism administered by any minister, by a layman, or even by a woman, gives the clergyman the right to insist on the burial service when he is dead. So that the same rite which enables a minister to say—"This man when alive was a member of my fold, and was sealed under my seal," gives the clergyman power to say—"Death has made him my property: though when living he never darkened the door of my church; he is now my property, and I am entitled to seal him with the seal of conformity." I think that proposition need only be stated to show its absurdity. How did such an absurd law come to pass? The reason is obvious. Dissent at that time was unknown. The parish priest was the spiritual father of his flock, and so far from its being a grievance to have the Church service read over the remains, the direst result of the major excommunication was that the excommunicated man was refused what was then the only mode of Christian burial. But when Dissent sprang up, what so natural, so obvious, as that men should wish that the same minister who attended them in health and in sickness should perform the rites over their graves? Thus it will be seen how a rite which was intended to be the comfort and the consolation of the laity, has become distorted into the prerogative of the priest. Do not think I shall say one word against the beautiful service of the Church of England—the most beautiful, perhaps, of uninspired compositions, and one which I never hear without emotion. I do not say one word against it. What I object to is its being forced upon persons whether they wish it or not. I can well understand that, taking this point of view, the clergy of the Church of England have a right to complain. For observe that on the one side the law enjoins them to read the service over every person who has once been baptised, and is not excommunicated or a felo de se, no matter what his religion or creed; and on the other, it prohibits the use of any religious service at all in the case of a person to whom, from any cause whatever, baptism has not been administered. So that on the one hand a man who leads a life in defiance of the laws of God and man, or who passes suddenly out of the world in some drunken brawl, with all his sins full-blown upon him, is committed to the grave in the sure hope of eternal life, and, as is well said by The Times this morning, he is said to rest in the Lord after his labours, no matter what those labours may have been; while, on the other hand, the unconscious infant who has known no wrong, or the young man or woman who may have led the life of a saint upon earth, may be committed to the ground with all the indignity of silence. Two Petitions signed by clergymen of the Church of England were sent to the Archbishops praying them to endeavour to alter this state of the law—a law which would be intolerable if their own good sense did not induce them to disregard its provisions. But there are others who have shown a determination to uphold the law. I mentioned on a former occasion several instances of clerical outrages—I can call them by no other name—enough to make one's blood curdle. I shall refer now to only one or two instances. One occurred some years ago at Hinderwell, near Guisboro'. A poor woman had been delivered of twins. The medical attendant baptized one of them, but the other died before the rite could be administered. They were put into a coffin together. The fact became known to the clergyman, who had the coffin broken open, and, while the baptized child was decently buried, the other poor, unbaptized child was sent away to be put into an unconsecrated grave. And that was done in strict conformity with the laws of the Church of England. Is not this a cruel outrage? Is it not a scandal to our land, and a disgrace to our country?

They make mankind the mourners."

Is this an isolated case? Another case of the same kind occurred at Thame three weeks ago. Another at Carlton, in Nottinghamshire, on November 27th. The account which I took from one of the Nottingham papers is too long to read, but I may state it thus: The child of a poor woman died unbaptized through no fault of her own, for she had endeavoured to get a clergyman to baptize it, but the requisite number of persons could not be obtained. The child was not baptized. The friends took the body to the churchyard at the time another funeral was going on in the hope that by these means they might come in for the benefit of a portion of the Church service. But the clergyman was not going to be taken in in that way. He removed to the further side of the grave of the baptized adult, distant by about fifteen or sixteen yards from that of the unbaptized child, and pointedly emphasized the words, in the singular, our

"dear departed sister," lest it should be supposed that any part of the burial service could be intended for a schismatic baby. Another case occurred at Leigh, in Kent, which is thus given in The Tunbridge Wells Gazette—

"At Painshurst station a man was killed and horribly mutilated by the express train running over his body. A widow and twelve children were left to mourn his loss. The case awoke the sympathy of all in the district, if we except the clergyman of the parish church at Leigh. How much he felt may be inferred from the fact that when application was made for interment in the graveyard, he not only refused to read the service over the poor man's body, but forbade the sexton to dig the grave, refused the use of planks and ropes to let down the coffin into the grave, and even closed the gate of the yard against the bearers and mourners at the funeral. The palisading had to be removed to make a way for the procession to the grave. Do you ask what sin this man had committed that made a clergyman refuse him not only the rites of Christian burial, but deny him burial at all, so far as he could, in the parish cemetery? It was that common sin of being a 'meeter,' which is more gross in the eyes of some clergymen than being a drunkard or a profligate. The good man was a regular worshipper in the chapel recently erected by Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., in that village, and a recognized member of the church there. His life, there is every reason to believe, was in harmony with his profession, and he commanded the respect of all who knew him. Such facts as these are more convincing to us country people of the need for the disestablishment of the Episcopal Church than the most conclusive arguments advanced by the Liberation Society. They make a greater impression upon our hearts. We talk about them amongst ourselves, and those of us who are too ignorant to understand the most lucid argument find no difficulty in appreciating the force and application of the fact. Is this a specimen of the light and sweetness which emanate from the parish clergymen of small country villages who are supported out of the nation's exchequer? What a mercy for poor Dissenters that such men do not keep the gates of heaven, or they would exclude our souls from paradise, as they do our bodies from decent Christian burial."

I will read one more extract from a letter which I have received from a Baptist member named Mr. Gibson—

"On Friday last an old gentleman of the name of Viney was interred in the churchyard at Crayford, Kent. The family being attendants on my ministry at the Baptist chapel, Crayford, were desirous that I should conduct a funeral service. This I did in the chapel. The corpse was then taken to the churchyard. On the way there I asked the undertaker if the clergyman was expected, and his reply was that he had not seen nor heard anything of the clergyman. On arrival at the gate of the churchyard no clergyman was to be seen. The corpse was then lowered into the grave, and I, standing in the road outside the churchyard, concluded the service. Word was then brought to the mourners at the grave that the curate was in the church waiting, and that he insisted on the corpse being taken up out of the grave and carried to the church. Some of the family went to him to endeavour to dissuade him from this. The remainder of the family, with myself, took our seats in the mourning coach. The son and son-in-law of the deceased came to us and said that it was no use, the clergyman would have the corpse taken from the grave and taken to the church. The daughters and other members of the family had to suffer the outrage to their feelings of seeing the coffin carried across the churchyard to the church, and then carried back to the grave, the clergyman and the clerk going through the service. When our children & they refuse to read the funeral service when requested to do so. When our adults die they compel us to have the service, however repugnant to our feelings."

Now, Sir, I do not know that I need dwell on these grievances any further, for the grievances are really admitted. In fact two Bills have been brought in from the other side of the House for the purpose of remedying them. The first was the Bill of Lord Beauchamp, brought into this House last year by the hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Mr. Cross). That Bill authorized the burial of Dissenters in the parish burial ground without the Church service, provided that no service was read over them—that is to say they must come in as solones de se, without any service at all. In other words, the hon. Gentleman said in effect to Nonconformists—"Take your choice between being buried like a Churchman or being buried like a dog." ("Oh, oh.") I do not mean to say that my hon. Friend made use of any such expression, but that was the sense in which it struck Dissenters. I am speaking the opinion of almost every Dissenter in the House when I say that a compromise such as that can only be regarded as an insult. Just let me read from an article from The Spectator on that very point—

"But what should we Churchmen say to such a privation? Is it not of the very essence of funeral rites that at the last look of the coffin, at the solemn moment when the anguish of the last leave-taking is felt, there should be words of prayer and religious hope pronounced? Why, you might just as well propose to refuse Dissenters the right of shaking hands at the moment of parting on the ship or in the train, on the plea that it would be quite good enough for them if they got the outward leave-taking done in their own homes, as propose that they should coldly deposit the corpse, without a word of solemn prayer or hope, in the earth, and so leave it. If you reduce human forms to the minimum which reason, apart from feeling, will justify, you really do away with them altogether. If we

Mr. Osborne Morgan

Churchmen value, as we do, that part of the service conducted at the grave as of the very essence of the burial service, why not remember that Dissenters are 'of the same flesh and blood,' and are not likely to be content with silent individual prayer and the bare act of interment? The clergymen all feel, and feel most intensely, the grievance to themselves in any sort of displacement from their functions, or in any compulsory mutilation of their own service, but their keen sense of the indignity of being extruded from their rightful place does not seem to help many of them in the least to enter into the indignity which the Dissenters feel at their systematic extrusion from the same offices."

Well, Sir, the other Bill was the Bill of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley). My hon. Friend by his Bill said, "We will give you every opportunity for having cemeteries of your own." Yes, but at what expense? There are, as it appears from a Return moved for by the hon. Member for West Surrey, only 531 parishes in England provided with public cemeteries, while the whole number of parishes is about 13,000, so that it would be necessary in carrying out his Bill to provide cemeteries for more than 12,000 parishes. I do not know what the cost would be; but I know it must be something in millions. And this enormous cost is to be incurred, and Dissenters are to be deprived of the melancholy consolation of being buried beside their relatives, and England is to be covered over with burial-grounds, some labelled "Church," and the others "Dissent," in order to prove to the world "how these Christians hate one another," and how, even in death, they will be divided. Look at the safeguards. Why, the Bill literally bristles with safeguards? In fact, it is the number of safeguards which it contains which has made it hitherto impossible to carry it through Committee; for, in fact, every safeguard constitutes a peg on which every hon. Member who opposes the Bill wishes to hang another safeguard. The Bill provides that notice may be given to the incumbent that a burial may take place in the churchyard without the services of the Established Church, but that no service shall be performed by a clergyman of the Church of England other than the service of his own Church. That proviso is not of my seeking. I objected to it at first. It was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope). In fact, in the first instance—and I hope it will be made known outside the House—I had inserted a proviso giving clergymen permission to use a different service. Then comes a clause providing that any service, if not according to the public ritual, shall consist only of prayers, hymns, and extracts from Scripture. I am almost ashamed to have inserted that clause. From what I know of Non-conformist ministers, there is not the slightest reason to suppose that they would make use of a friend's grave for attacking a political opponent. But, perhaps, it is better to err on the side of conciliation. Then the 5th clause provides that all burials shall be conducted decently and solemnly, and that all services shall be religious. The Act does not authorize the burial of any person who, previous to the passing of the Act, had not the right of interment. It gives the largest possible facility for the acquisition of cemeteries by private benefaction, and it provides that in places where there are public cemeteries the Act shall have no application at all. That is the whole of the Bill—a Bill which it is said is to shake the Church of England to its foundations, and which has actually brought up the Leader of the Conservative party into the front of the fray. Hon. Gentlemen may say it is not what is in the Bill; it is what may grow out of the Bill. The churchyard, they say, is the entrance to the church, and if Dissenters get into the churchyard, we shall not be able to keep them out of the church. I have spoken to very little purpose if I have not shown that the case of the churchyard and the case of the church depend upon very different considerations, and surely there can be nothing more illogical than this mode of meeting one issue by raising an entirely different one. Recollect, too, that grievances such as these are the strongest weapons you can put in the hands of those who desire disestablishment. Can you be surprised that men should desire the overthrow of the Establishment if they find that year after year a measure so just, so fair, and so conciliatory, is to be shipwrecked on the rock of ecclesiastical prejudice. It is said that many who support my Bill will also support the Motion of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), and that, therefore, their objects are the same. That is a curious kind of syllogism. It may amuse the House, but it will not affect the Bill. It may be said that a proof that the feeling of the country is against my Bill is given by the fact of so many Petitions being sent up against it. I think I can throw a little light on the mode in which these Petitions have been got up. There is a family likeness running through every one of them. They are all turned out of the same manufactory. About a fortnight ago, I received a printed communication from a postmaster near Manchester. It was sent to me, I suppose, because, as I found on opening it, my name was used pretty freely in the course of the communication. It purported to be from an association, and it contained what I must call a most disingenuous statement—a statement that the Bill would allow any member or any number of members of any denomination to officiate at any ceremony whatever, provided the ceremony was “religious, solemn and decent.” Now that statement does not allude in any way to the concession I made in restricting the service to hymns, prayers, and portions of Scripture. Indeed, that Amendment is only alluded to in quite a different part of the document, and in much smaller print. Then there is a statement that in towns and many of the rural districts public cemeteries are provided, so that the grievance is greatly diminished, and will soon altogether disappear. But what are the facts? There are 531 parishes provided with public cemeteries. There are upwards of 12,000 not provided with them. I say deliberately, any inference which has been based on such a statement as that in the document I have referred to, has been based on false pretences, and I ask the House to pay no attention to Petitions obtained in that way. Another argument used against this Bill last year was that Dissenters would make use of the funeral service for the purpose of making attacks upon the Church, and for what are called “political orations.” How it is possible to combine political orations with hymns, or prayer, or portions of Scripture, I, for my part, am perfectly unable to see. I suppose it will be said that a good deal of political animus may be thrown into hymns and prayers, and even into portions of Scripture. If that argument is used, I reply that we have the best possible answer, and one founded on practical experience. In Ireland—the home of sectarian animosity—in Ireland—where party spirit runs so high that voters have to be escorted to the poll by the military, and theological questions are sometimes settled by the aid of the bludgeon and the blunderbuss—a law far less stringent than the law I ask to introduce has existed for not less than seven years. Time after time I have stood here, and asked hon. Gentlemen opposite the question, “Can you tell me of one single instance in which these Acts have been abused in Ireland?” Time after time I have asked that question, and I have asked it in vain. But it is not only in Ireland that law prevails. In every other civilized country in the world with which I am acquainted different sects are allowed to be buried side by side, with their own service. When I brought in this Bill last year, there were two countries—England and Chili—where these restrictions existed. Now England is the only one, for the Parliament of Valparaiso has removed all barriers. In France, in Spain, in Catholic Switzerland, all sects are allowed to use the parochial churchyards. I do not know whether anyone whom I address has visited the churchyard at Zermatt, in the Canton Valais, the most Catholic canton of Catholic Switzerland, close to the scene of that appalling accident on the Matterhorn which shocked us all so much a few years ago. If so, they will not readily forget the beautiful spot where the dust of our brave but ill-fated young countrymen mingles with the dust of the noble-hearted guide, who gave his life for theirs, and the remains of the Protestant clergyman sleep peacefully beneath the shadow of the Catholic Church. I wonder what would have been said in England if the authorities of the Canton Valais, following the analogy of our cruel laws, had insisted that Mr. Hudson and his companions should be interred with Popish rites. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire winces at that question. And well he may. [MR. NEWDEGATE: No.] Then he ought to do. The hon. Gentleman knows that in such a case there would have gone up a cry of indignation from every Orange lodge in the kingdom, and that it would have been re-echoed from Exeter Hall to Belfast. Is Catholicism so much more Liberal than Protestantism? Is it to be believed that the Anglican priesthood, who boast themselves to be the most liberal priesthood in Europe, still maintain restrictions which the poor half-caste bigot on the pampus of South America has consented to put away? But is it the fact that the clergy of the Church of England are opposed to this Bill? The right hon. Gentleman opposite once boasted that he had got angels on his side. Is it true that the clergy are on his side? The whole of the Broad Church clergy are in favour of this Bill. The Church Reform Union, of which my right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) is the head, and of which the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) is a distinguished member, have approved of this Bill "as a measure of conciliation and compromise." The Church Association, although they do not approve of the Bill of last year, distinctly stated that with some of the provisions which are now introduced they entirely agree. The Dean of Westminster, speaking from that pulpit from which the bigotry of a few fanatics strove—but, thank God, strove in vain—to keep him, spoke in favour of the Bill. The Rev. Llewellyn Davies, one of the most large-hearted of clergymen, has written an article in The Guardian so noble and manly in its tone, that I will ask permission to read it to the House—

"Allow me a few lines to protest that there are clergymen—I hope not a few—who instead of opposing the Burials Bill, are heartily in favour of it. It seems to me that Christianity and policy would equally urge us to make the innocent concessions proposed by this Bill. Imagine the case of a Dissenting family in a country parish. They have been accustomed to worship together in their own chapel. The father dies, and is to be buried. The chapel has no burying ground. The churchyard has been a sacred spot in the eyes of the family all their lives. The survivors would like much to lay the remains of their dead in the common burial-place of the parish. But they do not wish at such a moment to go through an act of conforming to the Church. A not dishonourable sentiment makes them unwilling to stamp the departed, who has chosen to be a Dissenter, as a Churchman. Would not all humane and Christian feelings dispose us to meet such a case in a kindly spirit. Well, what concessions does the Burials Bill make to the Dissenters? It provides that any minister or member of a religious body or congregation having a registered place of worship, may recite prayers, hymns, and extracts from Holy Scripture at a funeral in a churchyard. No other person may take any part in the service, no use of the church is allowed, and no address may be delivered. It is further provided that the funeral must not be at an 'inconvenient' time, that all burials under the Act shall be conducted in a decent and solemn manner, and that no part of any service shall be other than of a religious character. What harm could so carefully guarded a Liberty possibly do to the Church? All that can be said is that it is a concession; it gives up some exclusive rights, and our Church Defence Societies are sounding their war-notes of resistance and defiance. It is actually preferred that Dissenters should be driven to insist, as a point of honour, upon the erection of unconsecrated burial-grounds within reach of every cottage in the land! It is difficult to believe that good Churchmen should be persuaded to favour so impolitic a course, and to do what they can to widen and fix the gulf between rural Nonconformists and the Church. But I am more concerned to remonstrate against the ungracious attitude promoted by our Church defenders! Non defensoribus latia tempora curat! It will be a lamentable thing if the Church is induced to repudiate the large-minded, humane, Christian way of acting which becomes the Church of the nation, and to adopt instead the bristling sectarian habit of mind, the attitude of watchful jealousy about rights which is natural enough to a militant sect."

The Rev. William Freemantle, rector of St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, writes to me even still more strongly. He says—

"Some one sent me the other day your Burials Bill, wishing me to get up a Petition against it. It is really shameful that when you have fenced in this proposal for a pure act of justice by every needful safeguard, there should be this agitation to resist it. I write to ask, is there likely to be any public meeting, or any means of expressing conviction in favour of the Bill? I would join any movement for the purpose, and I cannot but think that if public expression were given to a sense of justice on the part of a few clergymen, it would be responded to, so that we might not have again to undergo the shame of being supposed to resist the demand of right through jealousy of our supposed privileges."

The Rev. Mr. Drake, chaplain to the Queen, the Rev. John Griffith—a name venerated in Wales by Dissenters as well as Churchmen—have written to me to the same effect. Time would fail me were I to read a tithe of the letters I have received from country, as well as from town clergymen, wishing me "God speed" with this work which is to end in the overthrow of their Church. And I have endeavoured to meet them in the same spirit. It was objected when my Bill was brought in, that its provisions were too wide. I consented to insert provisions to remedy that. It was argued that it might be made a pretext for political demonstrations. I inserted a provision that the services should be strictly devotional. The hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) said that was not enough, and proposed an amendment to restrict the services to hymns, prayers, and Scriptural quotations. I accepted the amendment. No sooner had I done so, than the hon. Member began to quarrel with his own amendment. Perhaps it is well it should be so. Perhaps it is better that the question should be fought out on its real issue. ["Hear!"] Yes, it is well that it should be stripped of the miserable sophistries with which three years of bitter controversy have invested it. Let it be understood that this is no longer a question between those who seek to invade and those who seek to defend the sanctity of the grave. It is no longer a question between Churchmen and Dissenters. No; I will tell you what it is. It is a contest between outraged humanity, on the one side—[Laughter—]—does any hon. Gentleman mean to say that for clergymen to open a coffin and take out the body of a dead child and fling it into the ground like a dead dog, is not an outrage on humanity?—it is a struggle between outraged humanity on the one side, and that ecclesiastical non possumus as rampant in Canterbury as in Rome—which mistakes obstinacy for strength, and clings with desperate tenacity to the poorest rag of its prejudices lest it should be suspected of the weakness of a just concession. It is the old struggle which the poet of the last century described more than a hundred years ago—

"While nature melts let superstition rave,
This mourns the dead—and that denies a grave."

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

MR. DISRAELI, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months, said, I am sorry, Sir, that I must divest this debate of the pomp and ceremony with which the hon. and learned Gentleman has clothed it in imputing to me that, in the course which I have taken, I have been actuated by the highest considerations of party and politics. The truth is, if the House will condescend to recollect what passed last year upon the subject, so far as I am myself concerned, they will see what a slender foundation there is for the conclusion at which in this respect the hon. and learned Gentleman has arrived. I was prevented from being present at the debate on the second reading of the Bill last year.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: There were six Amendments on the Paper last year. Was the right hon. Gentleman prevented? ["Order."]

MR. DISRAELI: And I took as early an opportunity as I could of publicly announcing that I should ask the sense of the House on the third reading. That was last year. My opinion was and is that the measure is one of great importance. My opinion was and is that it never had been adequately discussed, nor in an adequate meeting of the House; and this year I found myself not only bound by honour, but impelled by feeling, to fulfil the task which I undertook and sought to fulfil last year. The hon. and learned Gentleman complains of the manner in which this Bill was encountered last year, by midnight strangulation. Well, Bills are sometimes met by midnight strangulation, but they are also sometimes assisted by morning manoeuvres. Measures may be passed in a very thin House, and by seizing opportunities of hurrying on a decision, which both the House and the country may afterwards regret. Now, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman has called our attention, in detail, to the provisions of the Bill. I listened with great attention to his comments upon those provisions, and I confess it appeared to me that he slurred over their contents in a manner which to me was not entirely satisfactory. The Bill is distinguished, I think, by three peculiar circumstances. In the first place, it is an attempt—and an attempt made in the latter part of the 19th century—to invest with exceptional and exclusive privileges certain religious bodies and their ministers. The second remarkable circumstance connected with this Bill is, that they who are exempted from these privileges are no less considerable a portion of the nation than those who are in communion with the Church of England, and no less important a body than the clergy of that Church. And the third remarkable circumstance is, that such a measure should be introduced by an hon. Gentleman who professes to be a Liberal. Now, Sir, notwithstanding the manner in which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to, and, as it appeared to me, slurred over, the provisions of his Bill, I think he will agree with me that I have not misrepresented its contents when I state that there are distinctions made between the Nonconformist Body and the Church, and that they are all in favour of the Nonconformist Body. In the first place, all Nonconformists will have a right to officiate, with the mere consent of the relations of the deceased; while, on the other hand, the incumbent alone will, as at present, have a right to officiate. In the next place, every Dissenter may under the Bill enter a churchyard and officiate by right, while, on the other hand, no other clergyman but the incumbent can officiate except by permission. The third privilege which it is proposed to grant to Dissenters is this—that all laymen among them may officiate, while no layman may officiate in the Church. The fourth feature of this character is this—that a Dissenter may enter and officiate in any churchyard in his parish, while the right of the clergyman to officiate is confined to the churchyard of his own parish. The fifth privilege granted to Dissenters is, that under the Bill they are practically unlimited in the services they may use, while the clergyman is rigidly tied up to a prescribed service. I am sorry I must trouble the hon. and learned Gentleman with a sixth privilege, which he has provided for Dissenters, but which is not to be assured to the clergyman. The Dissenter has an option, and may leave ungodly and immoral Dissenters to the clergyman—the clergyman is compelled to bury in all cases. Now, I must say, without touching the principles of the measure, to which I will in a moment advert, that it does appear to be a most remarkable circumstance that a Bill—introduced with such a continued burst of eloquence as has distinguished the address of the hon. and learned Gentleman to-day, inspired as all must feel by a conviction of the peculiarly liberal character of the measure—should contain provisions of a character so abstractedly unjust as those to which I have called the attention of the House. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN rose to make an explanation, but was met with cries of “Order.”] Well, but that is not enough. As if it were not sufficient to point out in so marked and painful a manner the different conditions under the intended law of the Nonconformist and his minister and the Churchman and his clergyman, there is a seventh provision which certainly is not the institution of a new privilege, but which contains an arrangement by which the clergyman is compelled to act as clerk to the Nonconformists, to register all their doings, and thus to occupy the inferior position of recording all their proceedings, which, under this Bill, might at least be eccentric. Now, Sir, I think it would be interesting to try and ascertain the association of ideas and the mental and intellectual process by which the hon. and learned Gentleman, who believes that he is influenced by most liberal opinions, should have arrived at a proposal which is, as I think I have pointed out to the House, so essentially unjust. How did the hon. and learned Gentleman arrive at this proposal? By the common law of this country it would seem that the rights of all parishioners with respect to burial, whether they be Churchmen or Nonconformists, are identical. The Nonconformist has a right to be buried in the parish churchyard on the same conditions that the Churchman has a right to be buried there. The Churchman enjoys no privilege which the Nonconformist does not enjoy. But, then, it is said it is a grievance to the Nonconformist that he cannot be buried in the parish churchyard with the rites of his own communion. Well, the Nonconformist has a right to enter the parish church; but what would be said if the Nonconformist, having exercised that right, rose from his bench or pew and said—“I am here in the enjoyment of my right, but I object to the Liturgy which you are about to use?” I can find only one reason for the conclusion at which the hon. and learned Gentleman has arrived, and I think I am not misrepresenting him when I say that he himself alleged that reason, and that is—that the fabric of the Church and its consecrated precinct are, in fact, national property. Although not absolutely declared, I infer from the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman that that is his view on the subject. The nature of Church property is a subject which for generations has occupied the attention of some of the greatest minds this country has produced. Perhaps there is no other subject on which there has been lavished such profound erudition, such deep antiquarian research, and which has excited such a sharp and commanding controversial spirit. Every man who has studied that controversy is fairly entitled to hold opinions of his own on the subject; but whatever may be our conclusions, and however profound may be our convictions with regard to it, it is a subject so vast and so grave, and of necessity so difficult, that we might expect very opposite conclusions to have been arrived at in relation to it. But, Sir, I deny that there is any controversy on this subject between the country and the Nonconformists. Forty years ago the Nonconformists, by means of a new law, acceded to a great increase of electoral power and a corresponding political influence; and they thereupon commenced an agitation—I may almost say “a thirty years’ war”—against the levying of rates for the maintenance of the fabric of the Church and of the consecrated precincts of the Church. It is unnecessary for me to remind the House of what is a considerable incident in the history of this country—the agitation conducted against the church rates by the Nonconformist Body. Well, they succeeded at last in their great object. Their case, as it was originally stated, as for years it was sustained with almost matchless energy, with first-rate organization, and with great eloquence, was this—they said, “The Church is a building which really is devoted to the purposes of only a portion of the nation”—a portion which they then called an Ecclesiastical Sect—“the churchyard is a ground consecrated, which we hold to be a superstitious practice, and we believe that it ought not to be maintained; and, therefore, what can be more unjust than that we should be called upon to pay taxes for the maintenance of a fabric that we don’t use, and of a churchyard the character of which we don’t approve? and, under these circumstances, we call upon Parliament and the country to relieve us from such a grievance and from such an injustice.” Their appeal was ultimately successful. After a struggle of, as I said before, thirty years, Parliament acceded to their wishes. Parliament acknowledged that there was a religious grievance, that it was intolerable, that the Nonconformists were not interested in the maintenance of the fabric of the Church or of the churchyard, and relieved them from the payment of the taxes they complained of. With their relief from those taxes the controversy between the country and the Nonconformists as to the character of Church property ceased; and if ever there took place what I believe would be one of the most unfortunate events that ever occurred in this country—I mean the disavowing of the State from its connection with religion—so far as the position of the Nonconformists is concerned, they can make no objection whatever—they are estopped from ever making any objection—to Churchmen taking their sacred edifices and their churchyards. I, with many on this side of the House, and I believe with some on the opposite side, opposed the abolition of church rates. I did so because I did not wish to see a source of revenue necessary to the maintenance of the Church abolished, whereby great embarrassment would arise, and injury would result to the Church fabrics in many parts of England, and especially in the rural districts. Of all taxes which were ever imposed upon the nation, the church rate was the least unbearable. It was imposed for a public, not to say common object, and by a most popular method—namely, by the decision of the majority. But doubtless it was some compensation to us to think, when the abolition of church rates was carried, that it was a public recognition by the State that, whatever might happen hereafter, the churches and the churchyards belonged to Churchmen. Neither did the Nonconformists during that great struggle act without a full knowledge of the consequences that their success would entail. A most eminent member of their body, a very learned lawyer, was so impressed with the folly of their conduct in the position they took up in seeking to relieve themselves from the payment of church rates, on the ground that the churches and churchyards should be maintained by those who used them, and for whose purposes they alone existed, that he in more than one learned work impressed his convictions upon them, and supported those convictions by ample erudition. I refer to Mr. Toulmin Smith, who, although he may not have been a Selden or a Spelman, was a learned legal antiquary. Upon this subject I hold that he took the right view, and that his conclusions upon it were sound. It cannot, therefore, be said that the Nonconformists rushed into the contest with precipitation, or that they were blind to the necessary consequences of their success in seeking for such a long series of years to obtain the abolition of church rates. Having taken up their position, they must abide by its consequences. If the churchyards are national property, let the nation support them. If they are national property, re-impose the church rates, and let the Dissenters pay up all arrears which unquestionably are due to the country. I am perfectly willing myself to rest the whole of my opposition to this measure upon that case. By the abolition of church rates, and by throwing the maintenance of the fabric of the churches and of the churchyards upon Churchmen, the Nonconformists have placed themselves in such a position that they are not justified in interfering with the conditions upon which they are allowed to use churchyards. If I pursue the subject further it is only because I do not wish to avoid any topic which has fairly been brought before the House. I must say in passing that there is not merely a legal inconsistency in the conduct of the Nonconformists in their treatment of the question, but there is a sentimental one which I think ought to be noticed. The Nonconformists originally objected to churchyards because they were consecrated, which they said was an act of superstition; and, no doubt, making every allowance for the great increase in the population of the country, and other circumstances, it is mainly to the energy of the Nonconformists, and to their prejudices against burial in consecrated ground, that the institution of public cemeteries in this country on so large a scale has taken place. But, having established these great public cemeteries, the Nonconformists want to go back to the consecrated grounds; and on what plea? It is a plea that touches every heart—it is that they may be buried in the same locality where their fathers and their relatives have been buried. But they quite appear to forget that in coming back to the consecrated ground they leave the unconsecrated ground of the cemetery which they have used for a generation, and in which also lie the remains of their relatives. This appears to me to be an inconsistency on the part of the Nonconformist Body which it is not easy to explain. But, passing on, I wish now to consider the question without reference to what I have urged, and in its more abstract character as a religious grievance. If there be a grievance, the House of Commons ought to consider it; and if there be a religious grievance, a wise statesman will not disregard it. But, in the first place, we must satisfy ourselves as to what we are doing. It is no use for an hon. Member to come down here and to tell us stories, which may be true or untrue, which he has read in The Tunbridge Wells Gazette, and to ask us to alter the ancient laws of England upon an authority like that. So far as I could collect from the narrative contained in The Tunbridge Wells Gazette, it relates, if true, to what would only be the act of a foolish clergyman doing something which was essentially illegal; and are we to be asked to change the whole laws of this country because a foolish clergyman does something illegal? If there be a grievance, let us ascertain in the first place what it is, and then let us ascertain its extent. If we are to change the laws of this country on a subject of some magnitude, let us have before us ample and authentic information. If I were to adopt the statement, and if I were to be guided in my vote by the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman I should believe that, out of 13,800 parishes in England, in 12,400 there is no accommodation for the burial of any Dissenter. Is it possible that such is the case? Is it possible that society could exist or civilization could go on if such a fact were correct? In such a matter we ought to have adequate Returns. The hon. and learned Gentleman says he has been four years engaged in the enterprise of changing the law upon burials. He says that during that time I have generally been absent, and always silent. But if I had been here on every occasion and listened with the utmost attention to the hon. and learned Gentleman, so far as I can judge from his speech to-day, I should not have obtained much information on the subject. I came down here to pay the utmost attention to his statement; but, though the hon. and learned Gentleman quoted all sorts of anonymous authorities from The Times down to The Tunbridge Wells Gazette, I have been able to obtain no information whatever of an authentic character. Now, I apprehend if the Nonconformists represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman who has been engaged in an enterprise, which, according to the hon. and learned Gentleman's account, has taken up four years, desired, they might have obtained this information—1. Returns as to the number of Nonconformist burial grounds in each parish; 2. As to the number of public cemeteries with unconsecrated ground in each parish; 3. As to the number of Dissenting chapels in each parish, and in what parishes there are none. If the hon. and learned Gentleman had given that information, we should have been able to arrive at some conclusion. The Returns on the Table of the House in connection with burials are very incomplete and extremely partial in the slight information which they afford, and I think that both sides of the House will agree in this, that we should be able to legislate with much greater satisfaction to ourselves, and I am sure to the country, if we had the information before us which I have indicated in the three Returns I have named. It so happens that there is a body in this country who have endeavoured to make these researches. I am not going to found any argument, so far as the principle of the Bill is concerned, upon these researches, the result of which is in my possession, because they are not complete and they are not official. Therefore, so far as the principle of the Bill is concerned, or any principles involved in it, I base no argument upon them. But these Returns, from the respectable character of the body that instituted the queries, and the official character of the persons who answered them, are extremely valuable. I think they will show that there is upon this subject a great deal of information of which we are ignorant; and, therefore, that it becomes incumbent on Parliament to take steps to obtain complete and official Returns. I place those which I possess before the House with no other view than that. I ask no gentleman to arrive at any conclusion from these Returns; but I ask him respectfully to listen to them. I shall put them very briefly before the House, which I am sure will see that in this matter we are called on to act with that ample information which Parliament should always possess. Now, these Returns were made under the three heads which I have mentioned, and were obtained by the Church Defence Institution—a body which, though there may be many persons who will not agree with it, all will acknowledge to be composed of most respectable persons, animated by a high sense of duty. They have applied themselves to the effort of obtaining authentic information, and have addressed three queries, which I have put under the form of Returns, to the rural deans of England—a body between 700 and 800 in number. They have succeeded in obtaining a great many Returns, and the House will regret that they have not obtained more. They have Returns from 6,200 parishes out of 13,800. By these it appears that there are in these 6,200 parishes 8,200 Dissenting chapels with 1,627 burial grounds—that is, one chapel in five has a burial ground. And yet the hon. and learned Gentleman argued the whole case to-day as if there were nothing but churchyards and public cemeteries, which last are of modern institution. But, besides these there are in these parishes 421 public cemeteries with unconsecrated ground, increasing every year with more extended areas, and now averaging one for every 14 parishes. Now, the House will see at once this represents a state of affairs which, so far as the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman is concerned—and we know he has been considering his speech for at least four years—appears to, have been completely veiled. The question of Nonconformist graveyards seems never to have occurred to the hon. and learned Gentleman, although we may fairly presume that at this ratio there cannot be less than 4,000 places of Dissenting sepulture in England. But what I think very important in connection with this matter are the Returns from the Principality in which the hon. and learned Gentleman has peculiar interest. I come first to the diocese of Llandaff. There are Returns from 132 parishes in that diocese, showing that there are 103 burying grounds for 238 chapels, the deficiency being supplied by 11 public cemeteries. That is the state of affairs in the diocese of Llandaff, with which if I were a Nonconformist and contemplated my burial I should be tolerably content. In the diocese of St. David's there are 165 parishes with 345 chapels and 209 burial-grounds. In one of the rural deaneries the proportion rises as high as 17 burial-grounds for 18 chapels, and to complete this wealth of burial-grounds there are 16 public cemeteries. We could hardly suppose from the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman that was the state of the Principality with which he is so familiarly acquainted. Unfortunately, the Returns from the other Welsh dioceses are very meagre; but I beg the House to remember what I said, that I am not founding any argument against any principles of the Bill on these Returns. But I think they show that it is our duty to obtain complete and official information. But although the Returns from St. Asaph are meagre, still here is one which is striking; and that is from the rural dean of Welshpool. In the rural deanery of Welshpool there are 14 parishes, containing 59 chapels, 11 Nonconformist burial-grounds, and two public cemeteries. The whole population of these parishes is only 15,000, and deducting, according to Nonconformist principle, one in five for the Church, we have a probable death-rate among Nonconformists of 250 per annum, and as many as 13 graveyards to receive their dead. Now, I do maintain that if these Returns be accurate—and the inquiry was instituted by a body of noblemen and gentlemen whose character is above all reproach, and the Returns made by gentlemen in a high official position—namely, the rural deans of England and Wales—I say if these Returns are accurate, and no one can doubt them—I could almost pledge myself to their accuracy, although the House knows as much about them as I do—the result is entirely contrary to the impression which the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman was intended to produce; and proves that, before we make a change of this character, we should have information to guide the House of Commons and satisfy the country that we were not acting in the dark and according to the transient passion of a minority of the population. Let me refer to one other subject. I confess a conviction has been produced in my mind by the information I have quoted that, if a grievance exists at all, it must be a very minute grievance, and that it does not warrant the vast change which the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman involves. But is there even a minute grievance? I wish to discuss the matter with my Nonconformist friends with the utmost fairness. Now, view it in this way. Even if a minute grievance is alleged, it is founded on the abstract assumption that there is a prejudice among Dissenters against the occasional use of a Church Service. Now, that is a pure assumption. I will not appeal to the individual experience of gentlemen on either side of the House; if I did I am sure they would tell me that in their parishes there is not the slightest difficulty in the matter. Dissenters raise no objection, and often even express a wish for the offices of the Church. We know, notwithstanding what the correspondent of The Tunbridge Wells Gazette wrote, that there is generally a feeling of mutual respect and affection between the incumbent of the parish church and the Dissenters; that there are relations of intimacy and confidence between them, and offices are rendered social and even religious of inestimable character. Look at the evidence upon our Table, as to the occasional use by the Dissenters of the offices of the Church of England. Look at the Returns of marriages in England. Observe that 75 per cent of the marriages are solemnized according to the rites of the Church of England. It is perfectly clear that of these 75 per cent a very large proportion must be Nonconformists. We all know that a Dissenter is generally by choice married in Church. Is the Burial Service more calculated to give umbrage to the Nonconformist than the Marriage? Of all Church Services the Burial Service would seem of most general and solemn sympathy. Therefore, I cannot admit that Nonconformists have even a minute grievance to complain of. But I have argued the case with regard to grievance totally irrespective of the principles on which I have objected to this measure. I object to this measure because I think after the Nonconformist Body, by a ceaseless agitation and a persevering energy which does them credit, induced the Parliament of England to free them from the obligation to pay church rates, on the ground that they had no connection with the fabric of the churchyard, all necessary connection between the Church and the churchyard, so far as Dissenters are concerned, ceased; and if they will use them—I wish they would use them more—they must use them, upon every principle of law and equity, on the conditions imposed by those to whom they belong. And now, before sitting down, I would make one remark to my Nonconformist fellow-countrymen on this matter. About 40 years ago an Act was passed in this country—the Reform Act of Lord Grey

—which invested the Nonconformist and Dissenting Bodies in this country with great power. Whether it was intended or not it is unnecessary now to consider, but there is no question that they gained a preponderance of electoral and political power under that Act—I must say out of proportion to their population and their wealth—I will not say to their intelligence and public spirit, for they have always been distinguished in those respects. That power which they gained 40 years ago they have used with great energy and with admirable organization. I do not for a moment pretend to say that there have not been many instances in which they have used it wisely. So long as they maintained toleration, so long as they favoured religious liberty, so long as they checked sacerdotal arrogance, they acted according to their traditions, and those traditions are not the least noble in the history of England. But they have changed their position. They now make war, and avowedly make war, upon the ecclesiastical institutions of the country. I think they are in error in pursuing that course. I believe it is not for their own interest. However ambiguous and discursive may be the superficial aspects of the religious life of this country, the English are essentially a religious people; and I am much mistaken if there be not, even among those who may be apparently in careless communion with its rites, a feeling of reverence and affection for the Church. They look upon it instinctively as an institution which vindicates the spiritual nature of man, and as a City of Refuge in the strife and sorrows of existence. I want my Nonconformist friends to remember that another Act of Parliament has been passed affecting the constituencies of England since the Act of 1832. It appeals to the heart of the country. It aims at emancipation from undue sectarian influence; and I do not think that the Nonconformist Body will for the future exercise that undue influence upon the returns to this House which they have now for 40 years employed. I address gentlemen of great acuteness, and, though they may not touch upon the subject themselves, I dare say there is more than one Member present who has, perhaps, the same opinion as myself upon that subject. Let them not be misled by the last General Election. The vast majority arrayed against us was not returned by the new constituencies. It was the traditional and admirable organization of the Dissenters of England that effected the triumph of the right hon. Gentleman. They were animated by a great motive to enthusiasm. They saw before them the destruction of a Church. I do not think that at the next appeal to the people the Nonconformist Body will find that the same result can be obtained. I say not this by way of taunt, certainly not in a spirit of anticipated triumph. I say it because I wish the Nonconformist Body to pause and think, and to feel that for the future it may be better for them, instead of assailing the Church, to find in it a faithful and sound ally. There is a common enemy abroad to all Churches and to all religious bodies. Their opinions rage on the Continent. Their poisonous distillations have entered even into this isle. We see ancient dogmas, thrice refuted, dressed up again in the garb of specious novelty, and again influencing the opinions of men. What I want to see is a cessation of this war between the Nonconformist Body and the Church of England. Let them be allied against the common enemy, and resist the influence of those who, if successful, will degrade man and destroy civilization.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MR. T. HUGHES said, that if he were a Member of the Liberation Society, he should feel inclined to propose a vote of thanks to the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down for the speech which he had made. He (Mr. Hughes) had never heard a speech more calculated to bring about a separation of Church and State than that of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman objected to the Bill on the ground generally that it invested Dissenters with peculiar privileges allowing them in fact to do what could not be done by Churchmen. But though the measure certainly did not contemplate any but ordained ministers of the Church of England performing the Burial Service of the Church, while it permitted Dissenters to perform their services without qualification, the House should remember that that course was in perfect conformity with the practice and creed of the Church of England, which permitted none but ordained ministers to engage in the offices of the Church, while no such limitation existed in many of the sectarian denominations. Another objection urged by the right hon. Gentleman was, that this was introduced as a Liberal measure. But he denied that during the four years it had been before the House it had been regarded by its supporters as a party measure, and it would have been equally acceptable to those who now supported it, if it had originated with any Gentleman sitting on the Opposition benches. Again, it was objected that the Bill in no way limited the services which might be used. This was not the case, the permitted services being expressly limited to prayer, hymns, and portions of Scripture. But in any case he did not believe that any denominational minister acting under this Bill would say or do anything which could reasonably give offence to any clergyman of the Church of England. If, however, language, which by any interpretation could be regarded as offensive were employed on any such occasions, did the right hon. Gentleman believe that the words would hang about the yew trees, the church porch, or the hedges, ready to fall upon the heads of unsuspecting clergymen? He did not believe, moreover, that any sound objection could be founded upon the argument that Dissenting ministers would bury the good among their congregations, and leave their immoral members to be interred by the clergy of the Church of England. No doubt, in some denominations they thought very much more of election than the Church did, and believed that they could distinguish the tares from the wheat; but it was one of the noblest features of the Church of England that it made no attempt of that kind; and if the Dissenters should leave their immoral dead to be buried by the Church of England clergyman, he (Mr. Hughes) hoped that they would accept the work without attempting to draw any such line. Again, with respect to another of the right hon. Gentleman's objections, that the Church clergy would be compelled to act as clerks to Dissenters. The only case in which, as far as he could see, the clergyman could so act would be when he had to sign the register, a duty for which he would receive his fee, and if even his submission went further it was, or should be, the highest boast of a clergyman of the Church of England that he was sempiternus servorum, ready to act in his sacred capacity for all who came to him. The equality for which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to contend was an equality that would not be acceptable to members of the Church of England. They did not ask for any such equality. Nonconformists might exercise liberty in this respect, but no member of the Church would be likely to complain at the prospect of being buried in accordance with the rites of his own Church. The right hon. Gentleman accused the Dissenters of logical and sentimental inconsistency in this—that they wanted to go back from what they declared some years ago. He (Mr. Hughes), as a Churchman, need not concern himself with this charge of inconsistency, which he left the representatives of Nonconformity to answer; but what he said was, that this Bill embodied what it was a just and right thing to do, and a thing which should be done whatever the conduct of the Dissenters might have been in the matter. It was said that the Nonconformists had really no grievance at all; but, if so, why was this tremendous opposition made to giving what they asked? The right hon. Gentleman had exhorted the Nonconformists not to make war upon the Church; but it should be remembered that in the vast majority of parishes in this country there were no burial-grounds except those of the Church of England, and an appeal such as that made by the right hon. Gentleman should, therefore, be preceded by an attempt on the part of those who made it to do right and justice. What was asked was that the authorized representatives of a religious denomination should be allowed to perform a certain religious service over the graves of their people, who, be it remembered, had just as much right already to sepulture in the national graveyards as Churchmen, and, surely, if the Church of England wished the war with Dissenters to cease, it should begin to do what was right and just in this matter. The opposition to this Bill grieved him, as a Churchman, more than he could express. He had dreamed of the time when the Church would have risen again to the great work and position which, in theory, she still held as the Church of the whole nation, and when she would have opened her arms to receive back those religious bodies who had but slight differences with her. Believing that this state of things would be the best for all parties, it was with peculiar regret that he witnessed the opposition of the great Conservative party to so small and reasonable a concession to the Dissenters as was asked by this Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed that three years ago he moved the rejection of a similar Bill to this, and since then he had not spoken in the House upon the matter. This being so, he hoped he might be allowed to state briefly his objections to this Bill, and he hoped also that he should say nothing that would in any way hurt the feelings of the Dissenters. It was his sincere wish that the Church of England should long remain the Church of England, not so much for the good of the Church itself, but because it was almost essential for the nation that the Church should be connected with the State, and that the two should be bound together. He would do nothing to make the Church of England a mere sect as distinguished from a national Church. He would shortly allude to the cases of hardship and outrage which the hon. and learned Member had referred to in moving the second reading of this Bill. When they were investigated it seemed that in two of the instances the clergymen were actually breaking the law which they were bound to obey. In the case of "outrage," that was not a Dissenting grievance at all, because there would have been the same hardship if the parents had belonged to the Church. What was complained of was that the clergyman drew a distinction between two children, one having been baptized, and the other not—which was not a matter that applied to Dissenters only, and did not in any way support this Bill. Having got rid of that matter, let them see what the grievance to be remedied really was. In the year 1861 Sir Morton Peto stated the grievance. He said that by the Canon Law of England a clergyman might refuse to bury according to the rites of the Church of England three classes of persons—those who were excommunicated, those who had laid violent hands upon themselves, and persons unbaptized; and he added that those who were specially affected under the latter head were Quakers and Baptists. Now, what was the Canon Law as laid down in Burn's Ecclesiastical Law? It was there said that no minister should refuse to bury according to the Prayer Book; the soil of the churchyard having been laid out and enclosed at the expense of the parish there was a common law right to be buried there, and the clergyman was bound to perform the services established by law. The foundation of this law was that the churchyard having been provided at the expense of the parishioners, they therefore had a right to be interred there, though only according to the rites of the Church of England. The Dissenter's right to use the churchyard for interment was precisely the same as his right to use the inside of the church. In both cases the right was accompanied by the limitation that the services of the Church were to be employed. As to the three exceptions to the right of interment, the first would apply only to those who were formally excommunicated—that is, in these days, to no one at all. The second exception applied only to those who, according to the verdict of a jury, had laid violent hands on themselves. Then came the case of those who were not baptized. The highest authority had said that a clergyman ought not to be curious to inquire into that matter, and the common sense of the country would support him in acting in that way. Further, the Church admitted lay baptism as well as clerical, so that a Dissenter who had been baptized by his own clergyman would be admitted as baptized by the Church. As Sir Morton Peto, therefore, had stated, the grievance was confined to Quakers and Baptists, who refused to baptize until the person was of a mature age. But now a further grievance was alleged, and Dissenters said—"You must allow us to enjoy our common law right of burial without the limitation hitherto annexed to it. You must allow us to bury with the services of the persuasion to which we belong, and by our own minister." Now, did the Dissenters generally in the rural parishes feel this as a grievance, or was it not rather a political grievance? In his opinion, it came from above, and not from below. It was forced upon the country Nonconformists; the Nonconformists did not force it upon the House as a rule. If it were not so, why were the Dissenters so ready to be married in the Church? Another argument pressed by the right hon. Gentleman should not be lost sight of. If the expense of providing a cemetery would be so great as to amount to a bar against the burial of Dissenters, it became material to inquire how many burial-grounds there were in England with unconsecrated ground of which Nonconformists might avail themselves if they chose to do so. He believed it would be found that the number was material; and, if so, the grievance was not so great as it had been represented. There was a third point which ought to be taken into consideration. The cemeteries in England and Wales were increasing in number almost daily. Their number was at present 531, and as a rule they were situated close to the most populous places in the country. Therefore we ought to compare, not the number of cemeteries with the number of parishes, but the number of people for whose interment the cemeteries provided accommodation on the one hand, with the country Nonconformists who required accommodation, on the other. Another point ought also to be considered in estimating the magnitude of the grievance which at present existed. Comparing the churchyard accommodation as it existed at present with what it was 50 years ago it would be found that the "life" of churchyards, if he might use the term, was so small that if the Dissenters would only wait for a few years their grievances would practically disappear, as it would become necessary, in consequence of the increase of the population, to provide cemeteries all over the country. There was no Return as to the "life" of existing churchyards; but the Return of the number of churchyards, cemeteries, and other burial-grounds gave some clue to the necessity for fresh accommodation. The first table enumerated all parishes in England and Wales in which any new portion of ground had been consecrated as a churchyard during the last 10 years. In every diocese there had been a vast number of additions to existing churchyards, or fresh churchyards altogether. If this number were multiplied by 5 it would be found that in the course of the next 50 years

—remembering, also, that the population was annually increasing—the present grievance would practically have vanished. He had shown that the grievance was at all events a small one; that it applied only to country districts; that it was being rapidly done away with; and that in consequence of the provision of cemeteries it would in a few years practically disappear altogether. The grievance, then, being a minimum, the remedy proposed for it was a maximum. The hon. and learned Gentleman who introduced the Bill (Mr. Osborne Morgan) spoke of it as a very simple and small matter to throw open the churchyards to the Nonconformists, and to allow them to perform their services there; but he (Mr. Cross) called it a very large matter—far too large for the minimum amount of grievance. He could have understood the hon. and learned Gentleman saying that all burial-grounds of all kinds should be open to everybody, for that was an intelligible proposition; but why the burial-grounds of the Church of England should be thrown open to everybody, while the burial-grounds of every other denomination remained closed, he certainly could not understand. One clause of the Bill provided that certain burial-grounds might be reserved for members of the Church of England; but this provision would be practically a dead letter, as it required that the person who gave the land must state in writing that it should be devoted to the interment of members of the Church of England only. This proviso would render the clause inoperative, because in the vast majority of cases, the land was subscribed for by a number of people, and not given by one individual. He therefore maintained that the remedy proposed by the Bill afforded no reciprocity, and was founded practically on no principle. An able writer, treating on the subject in the year 1861, remarked that in this matter, as in all matters of difference, the conflicting parties ought to put themselves into one another's position, and proceeded to ask how Dissenters would regard a law which placed their burial-grounds at the mercy of any clergyman who chose to improve the occasion of a funeral by elaborate ceremonies, with symbolical ornaments and rites, or who vigorously protested against those who dissented from the Established Church.

ber for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot)—namely, confined to prayer, the reading of Scripture, and the singing of a hymn. He had himself been present at the funerals of many Nonconformists, and he had never observed, where they were conducted by clergymen, more solemnity, or anything that was more in accordance with the character of the service, and the event which had led to it than was practised in connection with Nonconformist funerals. He agreed with the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) that there existed more feeling on this subject among the clergy of the Church of England than among the laity. He could testify that many laymen of the Church with whom he had come in contact had expressed a sincere desire that an end should be put to this controversy. There were, he was persuaded, many hon. Members opposite who were of that opinion also, and who believed with him that an arrangement might be made by which facilities would be afforded for the burial of Nonconformists in districts where they were placed at great and serious inconvenience in consequence of the distance to which their dead had to be conveyed for burial. Such an arrangement should, of course, guard against the intrusion of anything which would needlessly offend the feelings—with which he strongly sympathized—of Churchmen on the subject; but, until it was made, the grievance would remain to Nonconformists, and a root of bitterness be allowed to continue, which it was desirable should be plucked up.

MR. SCOURFIELD desired, as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Morley) had just done, to correct a misrepresentation—of course an unintentional one—made by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). He had no wish to enter into the theological part of the question before the House; but it was his duty to clear the character of a person who had been unjustly attacked from imputations which had been made upon it. He had before him the speech delivered by the hon. and learned Member on the 23rd of March, 1870, in which he asserted that at the funeral of the Rev. Henry Rees—one of the brightest ornaments of the Welsh Calvinistic community—the rector of the parish in which his friends desired to bury him “stood upon his strict rights,” and confined the service to the singing of a hymn. He could state upon reliable authority that the clergyman in question had not stood upon his strict rights. Had he done so, the Rev. Mr. Rees, not having been a parishioner, could not have been buried in the parish churchyard at all; as, indeed, he could not even had the present Bill passed into law. And he might add that some time before the death of Mr. Rees the vestry of the parish had, in consequence of the crowded state of the churchyard, passed a resolution to the effect that the interment of a stranger should not be permitted, and yet the Rev. Mr. Rees, although not a parishioner, was allowed to be buried there. He quite concurred in what had been stated by the hon. and learned Member as to Mr. Rees's character, and he might inform him that, when attending the funeral of the Rev. Mr. Jones at Carnarvon, Mr. Rees, on being requested to make an address, said he would not mar the effect of the beautiful service they had just heard by adding one word of his own. And, again, when attending the funeral of another clergyman in the year 1867, Mr. Rees refused to comply with a similar request, but, on being pressed, said a few words eulogistic in the highest terms of the funeral service of the Church of England. Professor Tyndall, referring a year or two ago in a lecture at the Royal Institution to a theory which he generally approved, but which he thought had been carried rather too far, said—

“A man of strong imagination occasionally takes a flight beyond the facts, but without this dynamic heat of heart the stolid inertia of the free-born Briton cannot be overcome; and as long as the heat is employed to warm up the subject without singeing it overmuch—as long as the enthusiast can overcome its mistakes by unequivocal examples of success, so long am I disposed to give it a fair field to work on.”

Now, the hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill had apparently wished to warm up his subject by the personal matters which he had introduced, but he had not hit the happy medium of warming without singeing. Much pain was given to a clergyman who had endeavoured to do a kind act by being held up to odium for it. The “Church of England service” was a somewhat fallacious term, for nobody could tell from the service alone to what denomination the deceased had belonged, such was its comprehensive nature. Living among Dissenters, he was anxious to redress every real grievance; but he deprecated the inflammatory statements which had been made; and with regard to the passion for equality on which the Bill was to some extent based, he would quote the remark of Jeremy Bentham, the great apostle of Philosophic Liberalism, that it had its root, not in the benevolent affections, but in the selfish, or, in the selfish combined with the malevolent.

Mr. CADOGAN supported the Bill because he believed it was calculated to meet a great requirement by allowing Churchmen and Dissenters to meet together, where their divergence before, whether great or small, had led to considerable bitterness and animosity. He had no sympathy with the ulterior object of disestablishment attributed to some of the advocates of the Bill. He had received a letter from one of his constituents, which he had not had time to verify, stating that his town had been scandalized by the refusal of burial rites for a Nonconformist unbaptized youth, a service being consequently performed in the road, with the coffin placed on two chairs. Those Dissenters with whom the absence of baptism was an integral part of their creed clearly ought not to be put in the same category with suicides. This was not a political question at all—it was purely a matter of grievance to Nonconformists, and as such he should support the present Bill.

Mr. HEYGATE said, he regretted that the alterations which had been made in the Bill since last Session were not sufficient to enable him to support it, although he felt strongly the desirability of putting an end to this long-standing controversy. But every overture made from that side of the House towards meeting the difficulty had been contemptuously rejected; and there was abundant evidence to show that the Nonconformists valued this Bill only because it tended to establish the principle, which he hoped would never be sanctioned, that Church property was to be enjoyed equally by all the religious bodies of the country. That was not an ancient right; and it was not sought to remove the conditions upon which that right was founded. His hope of the settlement of this question had been greatly chilled by the course which had been adopted by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley). The hon. Member, who represented a large amount of Nonconformist opinion, in 1871, when seconding the Address to the Throne, said—

“University Tests once abolished, and a fair Burials Bill agreed to, the House will have disposed of the two last of a number of measures, which used to be spoken of as ‘Dissenters’ grievances.’”—[3 Hansard, cciv. 68.]

But the measure for the abolition of University Tests having become law, and a Burials Bill having passed a second reading by a large majority, and appearing to be in a fair way of being passed, the hon. Member had voted in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England. Those who had expected much from the conciliatory language formerly used by the hon. Member were greatly disappointed, and had now no inducement to give up what they regarded as a great principle. The hon. Member for Bradford had himself declared that he approved this Bill, not for its own value, but because it dealt with a branch of a still greater question. Under these circumstances, members of the Church of England could not help feeling that when they had yielded on the subject of churchyards they would immediately be called upon to defend the churches. Many persons formerly in favour of this Bill were now beginning to discover that they had not rightly appreciated the true bearing of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies, in a speech at the Diocesan Conference of his own diocese, explained that he had voted for this Bill under a misapprehension, without due consideration of the subject; and doubtless many others, on realizing the object of the Bill, would hesitate to give it support. He trusted that in the course of this debate the right hon. Gentleman would express in that House the same opinion he had expressed in the country. Remarks having been made with regard to the number of Petitions for and against the measure, he wished to observe that while the Petitions against the Bill might have been obtained in overwhelming numbers in the rural districts, where the want of a Dissenters’ burial ground must be most felt, those in its favour had all come from large towns, where there were large cemeteries in the neighbourhood; from Wales, where there were ample graveyards attached to the chapels; or from Ireland, where the churchyard had been practically free for years, and where there was no Established Church. When hon. Members opposite said that the fact that these funeral services would be conducted by a Dissenting minister was a sufficient security for the character of the service, they forgot that these services would not be confined to the minister of a denomination. There were many religious bodies who had no recognized minister. The service must, therefore, be left open to be performed by a member of any registered place of worship, and no one could define who was or was not a member of a registered place of worship. It was impossible, therefore, that the House could have any security for the solemn and religious character of the service, and the probability was that if the Bill passed with the securities at present contained in it the House would be compelled next Session to agree to a Bill for amending the Act, and replacing these so-called securities by others more efficient. It would be impossible to have a ritual revised and approved by every religious denomination, nor was there any security with regard to the prayers to be used at the grave side. The fact was, there could not be two masters of the churchyard at the same time. He should be glad to see an amicable settlement of the question; but he hoped the House would never do what was suggested in the Bill, and make every churchyard and every church "the temple of all gods."

MR. BRUCE said, although he had on several occasions addressed the House on this Bill, and supported its second reading, he was anxious to say a few words again upon the subject. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) in bringing forward the Motion of which he had given so long a Notice for the rejection of the present Bill, said he did not do so specially in a party sense, and he was happy to bear testimony to the moderation of his tone. He congratulated the House upon the fact, because up to this time there had been on the part of the hon. Gentlemen opposite—and he spoke with some authority, having served on two Special Committees on Bills similar to the one before the House—a very great desire, so far as their principles allowed, to meet the wishes of those who were opposed to them in this matter. They had admitted the existence of grievances, and had made many propositions for their removal, as well as suggestions tending to show how that which was unpalatable to them might be made more palatable; and the friends of the Bill had on more than one occasion availed themselves of the suggestions thus made. The present debate had been hitherto conducted in the same spirit, and he trusted he should do nothing to disturb the good temper with which the House had approached the subject. If he had supported this Bill, which, in the opinion of many, made a great inroad upon the rights of the Established Church, and outraged the cherished ideas of persons whose opinions were worthy of all respect, it was because he was satisfied of the reality of the alleged grievances. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross), in his very temperate and able speech, had denied the reality of any grievances on the part of the Dissenters. Their first grievance was that on all occasions, when they used the parish burial-ground the funeral service of the Church must necessarily be performed over the person buried. He understood that there existed a readiness on the part of hon. Members opposite to alter the law in this respect, and to enable those who objected to the funeral service of the Church to inter their dead in the churchyard without any service at all. The next grievance, and that which had made itself most felt, was the law which prohibited the clergymen of the Church of England from performing the funeral service over the bodies of unbaptized persons. It was alleged that this was no real grievance, because the same law applied both to Churchmen and Dissenters. That was perfectly true; but the circumstances of the two cases were very different. In the case of members of the Church of England the service was never refused, except in the instance of children who, dying almost immediately after birth, had not been baptized. But with respect to Baptists, who were a numerous sect in this country, the case was entirely different. In their case baptism was not performed until a person had arrived at an adult age, the act being considered one of great religious solemnity and importance. The cases were, therefore, much more numerous where the funeral service had been refused to Dissenters than to Churchmen. He did not understand that hon. Gentlemen opposite supported that state of things. They might object to the sweeping remedy now proposed which got rid of it; but he was as certain as that he stood there that a temperate measure making some alteration in this respect would be supported by the great majority of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He was aware of the conciliatory disposition of Churchmen on this subject, because he had read the Report of the Ritual Commissioners upon the existing hardship of refusing to read the service over unbaptized persons. A proposal was made by the Bishop of Winchester and carried that an alteration should be made in the Ritual, and that a service different in some respects, but sufficient, should be adopted, which should carry with it the consolations of hope and meet the religious feelings of those who stood around the grave. Finding that to be the temper of the members of the Church of England it was greatly to be regretted that no legislative effect had hitherto been given to the desire of those who represented the Church with respect to the funeral service over unbaptized persons. The experience of the two past Sessions showed how difficult it was to deal with questions affecting the Ritual and order of the Church as established by law; but had it been possible to deal with these cases, the hardships put forward by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Osborne Morgan)—and he was sorry to say not always on the best authority—would have been removed. There remained a third grievance, and the question was whether it was a real grievance. That grievance was that the funeral services could not be performed in parochial churchyards over the graves of Nonconformists by persons of their own religious persuasion. It was said by the opponents of the Bill that Dissenters did not usually object to a clergyman of the Church of England performing the service, and indeed often preferred it. It was a fact that a large number of Dissenters were married in the Church of England, and undoubtedly where the clergyman was popular in his parish, relations of Nonconformists often desired that the funeral service should be read by him; but in other instances clergymen of a controversial disposition were disliked by the Nonconformists, who must in many cases wish the service to be performed by members of their own communion. He put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they would be satisfied, when rendering the last solemn rights to those dear to them, if the service was performed by persons of a different persuasion from their own. He asked them to realize the position of a Dissenter, attached to his own place of worship, and allied by long spiritual intercourse to the minister of his denomination, and say whether it would not be a grievance that the last rites should be rendered to such a man by a minister of a different communion. Under such circumstances, would they not feel a grievance? It was obvious that the feelings of Dissenters must often be hurt by the performance of the service by a minister belonging to a different body. It had been said that cases rarely happened in which the provisions of the Bill in this respect would be required. As to the statistics which had been quoted, it had been remarked that public cemeteries were generally found in very populous neighbourhoods, and that a comparison between the number of parishes and that of cemeteries was therefore no fair criterion of the extent of the grievance. It should also be remembered that a single cemetery often served for a number of parishes, perhaps eight or ten, forming one town. On the other hand, it had been sought to mitigate the hardship by a reference to the large number of cemeteries attached to Nonconformist chapels. Many of these cemeteries, however, were very small, and they were not intended for the reception of Nonconformists generally, but only for those belonging to the special body to whose chapels they were attached. Now, many places, especially in Wales, and probably also populous parishes in the manufacturing districts of England contained many such exclusive cemeteries, and in the absence of a public cemetery the Nonconformist would desire to be buried in the parish churchyard, not in the cemetery attached to the chapel of some Dissenting denomination to which he did not belong. After making every deduction, the cases must be numerous in which there existed only the parish churchyard. The hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Mr. Cross) had urged that with an increasing population, and with the short life of churchyards, new cemeteries must soon be provided, so that the grievance would disappear. In a vast number of parishes, however, especially those in which the Bill would operate, this was not the case. During the last three decades the population of the agricultural districts had tended to diminish, and no further provision was likely to be necessary. In many cases, too, the additional ground would be granted to the parish churchyards by private donors, and no public cemetery would be provided. Having shown the grievances which existed, he would now consider the objections that had been urged against this Bill. It was feared that disorders might occur; but the hon. and learned Gentleman who introduced the Bill (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had done all in his power to prevent them. He had introduced considerable Amendments into his Bill, and there was clearly much less room for apprehension on this head. One would suppose that upon this point the case of Ireland would be very conclusive. The hon. Member for South-West Lancashire had correctly related the earlier portion of Irish legislation; but he apparently supposed that, though Roman Catholics and Presbyterians had been entitled to burial in churchyards, no services had been performed by ministers of those denominations. Why, however, was the Act of 1868 necessary, which deprived clergymen of the power of refusing to allow such services? Clergymen had been found in Ireland refusing permission in cases where it ought to have been granted, and Parliament accordingly granted Ireland a measure almost identical with this Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS explained that he had stated that in consequence of some clergyman foolishly not giving the permission allowed by the Act of George IV., another Act was passed, and he was perfectly accurate in his account.

MR. BRUCE remarked that it was hardly to be supposed that the existence of a single grievance would have enabled his right hon. Friend the Postmaster General to pass a measure like that in question. A special case might have acquired prominence, but it could not be supposed that Parliament would have sanctioned so large a principle, the demand for the extension of which to England must have been foreseen, had not many instances of the kind been adduced. But the main argument after all—for it was admitted that the service might be performed without disorder and without infringing on the solemnity of the spot—was, that the real danger consisted of the consequences which might ensue from the passing of the Bill. The main objection that had been urged against the Bill was that it was another step towards disestablishing the Church, and the House was asked on this ground to resist a measure which it would otherwise accept. Now, he would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite how often that argument had been employed. The hon. Member for South-West Lancashire, who had brought it forward, would be the last man to desire the exclusion of Dissenters from corporations, yet the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act was strenuously resisted as involving the overthrow of the Church of England. Whenever, indeed, any measure affecting the supposed interests of the Church, but really tending to divert much hostility gathering against her, had been proposed, it had always encountered opposition on that ground. The House ought to consider whether the Bill was a just one; and as to the apprehended consequence, no inconsiderable number of Members supporting it were just as opposed as hon. Gentlemen opposite, to disestablishment. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had appealed to both sides of the House to unite against the common enemy, the promoters of infidelity. He (Mr. Bruce) would make a similar appeal on different grounds from those on which the right hon. Gentleman had based his appeal. He (Mr. Bruce) could not but remember that the Church of England lost a great opportunity of conciliation at the time of the Restoration. If the Church of England had then listened to the voice of Lord Falkland, Hales, and Chillingworth, and of leading Protestant champions, as much attached to her as any, many of the evils which had since flowed from a system of exclusion would have been avoided. The spirit of comprehension which animated those men led them to desire liberty on small points for the sake of unity on important points. The Church of England would be far more potent in a league with fellow-Christians against ignorance and infidelity than by keeping up barriers which excited hostility and distrust, and invested it with an invidious character. For the reasons he had given he should support the second reading of the Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I will not detain the House many moments, because I feel after the interest which has been excited in this Bill and the way in which this debate has been conducted, that it would be most unsatisfactory if we were not able to arrive at a decision to-day. I should not have risen had it not been that I wished to say a few words with reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to which we have just listened. The right hon. Gentleman has said, with very great truth, that setting aside a few expressions which perhaps had been rather the production of heated imagination than anything else, the tone and tenor of this debate have been fair and candid, and that those who have taken part in it have shown a desire to meet the difficulty which has been raised in a spirit of temperate and moderate liberality. The right hon. Gentleman has certainly shown us that he, at all events, has been actuated by this spirit in his remarks, for he has told us very candidly that of the grievances of which he has spoken, two, at all events, are easily to be disposed of, while the third really does not amount to very much. With regard to the first of those grievances, I think the right hon. Gentleman said there was—as there certainly is—a general concurrence of opinion that it would be both desirable and possible to get rid of any difficulty from the supposed necessity of reading the Service of the Church of England over the body of every person buried in the churchyard. I believe all persons agree that from that necessity clergymen ought to be relieved. As to the second point, with regard to unbaptized persons, the right hon. Gentleman says very freely that there is a disposition, as has been manifested by the Report of the Ritual Commission, to endeavour to meet that difficulty; but he failed to point out that this Bill does not meet it at all. The sensational grievance which was put forward with so much energy by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), is not at all touched by the provisions of this Bill, and if we are to expect a remedy in any other direction than that of the common sense and good feeling of the clergy we must look for it apart from this Bill. Therefore to bring that forward as a reason for supporting the measure appears to me to be a very inconclusive mode of reasoning. Then we come to the third grievance, that Nonconformists cannot have the Funeral Service read over their graves by those with whom they have worshipped in their lives. I think the right hon. Gentleman showed that although such a grievance may exist to a limited degree, it is one which has not very wide extent and will probably die out, for there is a large number of cases in which no objection would be made to the service of the Church being read over a Dissenter, and there are increasing facilities for the burial of Nonconformists in the churchyards or cemeteries where no such difficulty would occur. Therefore, the grievance in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman has already been reduced almost to a minimum. Nobody denies that there is a possible grievance in particular cases, and we cannot fail to see that it is desirable to remedy any grievance as far as practicable; but it is clear that the grievances have been exceedingly exaggerated and that the most important of them are not touched by this Bill. If that is the case, what are the objections to the passing of the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman says we must set aside the question of disorder. I do not know that it is quite reasonable to do so, for we are not certain there will be no inconvenience on that account, but we do not lay stress upon it. With regard to the latter point, however, mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman, undoubtedly he does touch the real grievance of the case. The difficulty in dealing with this case is not so much what is in this Bill as what lies behind it. There can be no doubt that the question which alarms a large proportion of the Churchmen of this country is not what they see in the Bill itself as what they believe it must lead to. As my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) very plainly and powerfully put the matter in the beginning of this debate—the question is—how are you going to draw the distinction between the Church and the churchyard? How are you going to admit, as a matter of right, the Nonconformists into the churchyard and exclude them from the church? How, in fact, are you going to maintain the principle of a National Church, if you make this considerable breach in the system? We are told that this sort of argument has been raised with regard to other measures; but I am not quite sure that in some cases it has not been a sound argument, and that the success of similar measures has not induced further attack. But, putting that aside, let us consider the question as it has been treated by the advocates of this measure. Admitting that the grievance is practically a very small one, and that the cases brought forward and magnified may be dealt with by good sense rather than by an alteration of the law, how are we to explain the very great heat and earnestness with which this measure is pressed? Why, we know that those who are pressing it are doing so, not to get relief for a few persons, but to obtain for the Nonconformist Body generally, a position of what they call Religious Equality in this matter. If this was spoken of as a case of intolerance, I suppose its antithesis would be toleration; but if anybody got up on this side and said—"We are ready to extend toleration to the Nonconformists," with what sort of a reception would he meet? The great body of Nonconformists in this House, and out of it, hold language for which I respect them; but it shows what their scheme is, for they scout the idea of toleration; and say that they want to be put on an equal footing with Churchmen in respect of their use of what they call the National Churches and National Churchyards. I would remind hon. Gentlemen of the tone and tenor of the resolutions passed with regard to this particular Bill by the great Conference of Nonconformists held at the beginning of last year. One distinguished member of that Conference said Nonconformists would accept no compromise of their cherished principles and undoubted rights, and declared that the disestablishment of the Irish Church was an anomaly unless it were followed by the "disestablishment of the Church of England and Wales." Can you be surprised, after such plain speaking on the part of those from whom this movement proceeds, if we decline to look at your Bill as a mere attempt to grapple with an isolated grievance, and ask whether this is not a step in a direction which you have a perfect right to invite us to take, but which we are equally bound to refuse? If you say—"Give up the outwork, which is untenable, for the sake of preserving the citadel," we have a right to reply—"Knowing that you aim at the citadel we refuse to give you admission into the outwork." I am reluctant to trespass upon the time of the House, because I feel the importance of our dividing to-day; but I could not help saying this much, in order that there may be no mistake about the issue on which we are going to divide. This is not a question of intolerance, or of the grievance of particular individuals, or of whether a clergyman has acted in an unfeeling and unkind manner; but of whether we are to maintain the position in which we stand with regard to the National Church, and to the privileges and rights of Churchmen.

SIR HERBERT CROFT said, he had in his hand a Petition from Dissenters and others, praying the House to reject the Bill. These were men who had lived in the same parish for centuries [Laughter.] Well, they were men whose families had lived in the parish for centuries, and their honoured dead lay in the parish churchyard.—

"Beneath those rugged elms,

The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep."

He did not wish to keep the Dissenters out of the churchyards, but on the contrary, agreed with the clergyman of whom the story was told the other day, that when asked whether he would bury a Dissenter in his parish, replied—"Bless you, I should like to bury them all." He wanted to know how many on the Treasury Bench, which contained some very religious men, were going to vote? He knew the Prime Minister was; but was the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General? A rumour was afloat in the Lobby the other day that the right hon. Gentleman wanted to speak on the Irish University Bill, but would not be allowed. ["Question."] The question was how the right hon. Gentleman wanted to vote. How was that hon. Gentleman going to vote who—the wit of the House—(Mr. Osborne) the other day said looked like a Nonconformist? And how would the Under Secretary for the Colonies give his vote, because he had said the other day that he had re-considered the Bill, and did not intend to vote for it. He supposed all the rank and file of the Liberal party intended to support the Bill; but he would venture to give them Punch's advice, and say, in a friendly way—"Don't." He had come up from the country that morning, and he could tell the Liberal party this, that if they supported this Bill the Liberal Churchmen would oppose them at the next Election. He wanted to say one word on behalf of the Church. He entirely denied the truth of the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had moved the second reading of the Bill (Mr. Osborne Morgan), when he said that the Broad Church clergy liked it. He never met a clergyman who did like it. At the same time, he admitted that something should be done. He never met a clergyman who refused to allow him to vote for the Bill that passed in "another place." They said something must be done, and they were willing to accede to silent burying. He knew a man of the highest character and intellect who said that if the Bill was passed, the cross he should have to bear would be too heavy for him. [Laughter.] He did not see what there was to laugh at in that. Well, this clergyman said he should have to resign his living and leave the Church. That was the opinion of a very honest rural dean. The question of cemeteries had been raised. He knew something about cemeteries. He had sat next to an hon. and Liberal Member on the Thanksgiving Day who had said to him—"What dogs in the manger those Dissenters are. When we give them cemeteries they won't use them. My respected father was one of the proprietors of Norwood Cemetery, and we have always had good dividends out of it. When Bishop Sumner consecrated it the Dissenters claimed a piece of ground, and we gave it up to them. They have not buried more than six people there, and yet, although we can't purchase any more land, they refuse to let us have theirs at any price, and the consequence is the whole place will be done for in 10 years." Who were the authors of this Bill? Not the Nonconformist Body generally. He would tell the House. It emanated from The Nonconformist newspaper, and was drawn up by the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the second reading, by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), and the printer's devil. That poor devil had had a hard time of it lately in assisting to get up Petitions in favour of this Bill. Why, the only man whose signature he did not see to the Petition he held in his hand was a Dissenter in his parish who took in The Nonconformist. He asked the House to reject the Bill. He did not believe hon. Gentlemen opposite knew the opinions of their constituents on it. Let them recollect that there would have to be a General Election between this time and the 10th of December, 1875, and this Division List would be carefully scanned by Liberal Churchmen with a view to see how their representatives gave their votes.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in reply, referred to a matter of which notice had been taken by preceding speakers, and regretted that he had been misled by a paragraph in a newspaper which he had not seen contradicted, to make a statement which was incorrect. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had objected to the Bill on this ground, among others, that an undue advantage was given by it to Dissenters over Churchmen. But such an advantage had never been intended by him, and was entirely owing to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) and the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins). What the Nonconformists said then and now was that as long as Churchmen retained the exclusive right to the churchyard, so long they were bound to pay for it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote) argued that if the House passed the Bill they would make such a breach in the walls that the Church itself would be injured. All he would say to that was this, that the Church of England had good reason to pray to be delivered from such championship.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I should not have troubled the House but for an allusion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Mover of the Bill, directly and personally to myself. He said that I and the members of the Orange Societies would be horrified at the idea of being buried by a Roman Catholic priest, and the hon. and learned Gentleman used this as an illustration of the horror, which a Baptist or a Wesleyan must feel at the idea of being buried by a clergyman of the Church of England. I represent many Wesleyans. I know many Baptists. I represent many Wesleyans and many Baptists; and I know that a great number of them feel no horror at the idea of being buried by clergymen of the Church of England. I cannot answer for what might be the feelings of the Orangemen in the case supposed by the hon. and learned Member; but I can answer for myself. I have no wish to be buried before my time in due course of nature; but I certainly had much rather be buried by a Roman Catholic priest than be baptised by a Roman Catholic priest; and it appears to me from the association in which the hon. and learned Member finds himself from the character of those whom I see surrounding the hon. and learned Gentleman, that he is much more likely to be baptised by a Roman Catholic priest than I am. I have observed the anxiety which the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) who sits next to the hon. and learned Member has manifested for the success of this Bill. He is a Roman Catholic. There has been an unusual activity among the Roman Catholic members from Ireland to-day, and this makes me imagine that they contribute largely to the impetus brought to bear in support of measures of this kind, an impetus which Her Majesty's Government seem unable to control; I believe that this impetus, although the front of the battle is held by a Churchman, nominally representing Dissenters, is chiefly attributable to the exertions of the Roman Catholic Members of the House. The right of using the churchyard is held, not only by the clergy, but by the laity of the Church of England, in trust for the common use of all the inhabitants of each parish, who may choose to avail themselves of it. This property is identified as belonging to the Church of England by the services, which are to be performed therein. The Church of England can only be recognized, whether in her personnel or in her property, by her services. These services are enacted by law, and form part of the title of the Church to her property. I rejoice that the services of the Church are regulated by statute; I rejoice that they exist by law, since this fact constitutes the security to us, the laity, that the Church shall be kept tolerant. The House has before it a proposal to invade this property, to change its conditions, to alter, to abrogate the title under which it is held. Why? Is the answer to be simply—Because it is held by law? Take another case. As the House is aware, there are numerous Conventual and Monastic Institutions growing up in this country, and holding property in defiance of the law. Everyone knows that monasteries are forbidden by the laws of this country, and it was asserted by Roman Catholic witnesses, who were examined before the Select Committee of this House in 1870, that the property held by convents is likewise held contrary to law; and yet this House shrinks from every inquiry into the existence of this property, far more from dealing with it in any way, while in cases of property held in accordance with the law the House has not scrupled to invade the title, by which it is held, and change its appropriation. This is not a solitary instance, this case of the Church of England. There are the Endowed Schools. You have broken up the title of every one of them; so with railway property. There is a Bill before the House to break up the title to railway property. How far, how much farther, I ask is the Liberal majority of this House about to proceed in this course? This course of disturbing every title, which has a legal sanction, whilst the House abstains from even inquiring into the possession of property, which is notoriously held contrary to law. I wish to put that matter as simply before the House as I can; and, in doing so, I thank the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire for his able speech. I am able to confirm the statements he has made with respect to the Nonconformist burial grounds. Some years ago Sir William Jolliffe, then a Member of this House, carried an Act with respect to the Registration of Burials. I moved for Returns under that Act. The order for these Returns has, however, never been complied with fully, but imperfect Returns have been given. These Returns, however, imperfect as they are, bear out the statements of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the number of burial grounds belonging to the Nonconformists. I am, therefore, in a position to confirm the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, when he says that this House is proceeding upon a supposed grievance, the extent of which they have no means of measuring by authentic information.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, that as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had made a personal allusion to him, he wished to remark, with the utmost candour, that if he thought this was an aggressive measure aimed at the demolition of the Established Church in England he should not give it his support. When the measure of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) for the disestablishment of that institution was before the House, he voted against it. He did so in the conscientious belief that the Church of England was in an entirely different position from that formerly occupied by the Church of Ireland. The present measure, so far from being aggressive, had been studiously prepared to meet as far as possible the objections urged during the last three or four years against previous measures on the subject. In particular the 6th clause emphatically declared that no person should have a right of burial under the Bill who did not possess such a right at present. The whole question, therefore, was whether the Funeral Service was to be performed by the representative of the religion professed by the deceased person. This has been done in Ireland ever since 1824, and if the same concession were made in this country it would doubtless be attended with the same good results.

COLONEL BERESFORD, who spoke amid loud calls for a division, was understood to say that in the borough which he represented (Southwark) there were many Dissenters, but that no grievance was felt to exist which called for the enactment of this measure.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 280; Noes 217: Majority 63.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

SPAIN.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will state the precise grounds on which Her Majesty's Government declined to recognize the Spanish Republic as established by the vote of the Cortes?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Her Majesty's Government cannot recognize the present Government in Spain as otherwise than provisional. A Constituent Cortes will, however, be convoked to pronounce upon the form of Government to be adopted. Pending the deliberations and decisions of the Assembly, Her Majesty's Government will simply follow the precedent that was followed in the case of the Governments that provisionally succeeded the ex-Queen Isabella, the late ex-King Louis Philippe, and the ex-Empereur Louis Napoleon. Even had it been decided to precipitate the recognition of the present Government, it does not appear to whom Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid should be properly accredited, or from whom he could receive his credentials.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. SALT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether information has been received that the United States are about to obtain an important harbour and coaling station in the Sandwich Islands; and, whether any efforts are being made to secure similar advantages for this Country?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, it appears from the reports received from the acting Commissioner at Honolulu that there is a party in the Sandwich Islands favourable to the cession of Pearl River to the United States in exchange for the concession of certain commercial advantages. This party consists of members of the mercantile community. The King is stated to be favourable to granting a lease of the harbour, but nothing definite has as yet been done on this subject. I do not believe Her Majesty's Government contemplate taking any similar steps.

TRADES' UNIONS—THE AMALGAMATED SOCIETY OF ENGINEERS.

QUESTION.

MR. HEADLAM asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been directed to a case recently decided by the County Court Judge at Newcastle upon Tyne, where the plaintiff, a working engineer, brought an action against the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, alleging that after subscribing for twenty-one years, according to the rules of the Society, he was denied the privileges to which by the same rules he was entitled in respect of his subscription; whereupon the counsel for the Amalgamated Engineers' Society, having met the case by a statement that the Society was not registered, and that in consequence there was no remedy whatever at law for such a grievance, the plaintiff was non-suited; and, whether, assuming that the case was rightly decided, he will be prepared to introduce a Bill to render such Societies as the Amalgamated Society of Engineers liable at law for the non-fulfilment of their engagements?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, my right hon. Friend will not feel offended at me if I say it is rather a bad precedent to ask the Attorney General for an opinion on a question arising in a private law suit. It is my duty to advise the Government, and also the House of Commons on any matter which may arise before them, and upon which my opinion may be required; but it is not my duty to give opinions upon matters between parties, and especially when the question involves my giving an opinion whether a Judge has or has not decided according to law. Now, if I were disposed to give an opinion on this case, the materials supplied would not enable me to do so. Assuming the Judge decided rightly, I am asked whether I am prepared to propose an alteration of the law of partnership. I am certainly not. The Judge decided, rightly or wrongly, that the association in question was a partnership, and he decided that on a most elementary principle. These associations may be registered as friendly societies, benefit societies, or as Trades' Unions under three separate Acts of Parliament, and it could be easily ascertained whether they were registered or not, and if they are so registered those who contribute to them have abundant protection. If, however, societies choose for their own purposes not to register, and if persons choose to join unregistered societies, they do so at their peril. I am certainly not prepared to propose an alteration of the law of partnership in favour of persons who join unregistered societies with their eyes open.

METROPOLIS—THE PRICE OF GAS.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, looking to the excitement which at present prevails in the Metropolis on the subject of the price of Gas, there is any objection to printing the accounts of the Metropolitan Gas Companies for the year 1872 at once instead of at the end of the Session of Parliament?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: I am not able, Sir, at once to have the accounts of the Metropolitan Gas Companies printed, because they have not yet been received, the meetings of the companies not having been held; but I believe they will soon be presented, and that I shall be able to lay the Return before Parliament at an earlier period than usual.

ARMY—CHELSEA HOSPITAL PENSIONERS.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would state to the House why no steps have been taken since the Royal Commission of 1870 to ascertain the wishes of the pensioners of Chelsea Hospital to remain or to leave; whether it is true that a pensioner of the name of Kirk, belonging to the left wing of the hospital, has been sent for seven days to confinement for sharing his regulation loaf with his wife, aged seventy-two; and, whether there is any sergeant in Chelsea Hospital who had been removed from Millbank for too great severity to the prisoners under his charge there?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the inquiry of 1870 was conducted, not by a Royal Commission, but by a Departmental Committee. It did not recommend, as the hon. Baronet seemed to suppose, that any steps should be taken to ascertain the wishes of the pensioners to remain or to leave. No married or in-pensioner is required to remain in the institution. Resumption of out-pension at any time is freely allowed. The pensioners are fully aware of this privilege, and a few avail themselves of it every year. I am informed that no pensioner named Kirk has been punished for sharing his regulation loaf with his wife. But a pensioner of that name was confined to the Hospital for seven days for attempting to take away fuel, the property of the Hospital, and to take his food outside at a forbidden hour. Though he had stated on admission that he had no relative dependent on him, he was afterwards allowed a pass to take his food to his wife at the proper hour. No sergeant or other person removed from Millbank for too great severity to prisoners is employed at Chelsea Hospital. The Sergeant of Police was formerly employed at Millbank, but he voluntarily resigned the employment, and left it with a good character.

SPAIN—SALE AND PURCHASE OF ARMS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON-DAMER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the article in the "Mémorial Diplomatique" as to the purchase of arms by Carlist agents; and, whether they will be prepared to follow the course taken by the French Government, prohibiting the exportation of arms to the Carlist party?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I am not aware, Sir, whether any Members of Her Majesty's Government have or have not read the article in The Mémorial Diplomatique. I may say for myself that I have not seen it; but I need scarcely remind my hon. and gallant Friend that the sale and purchase of arms in this country cannot be considered as an illegal act, and Her Majesty's Government cannot proceed exceptionally in the present instance.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any sum is now available for distribution on account of the Banda and Kirwee

Booty; and, if so, what is its amount, and when will it be paid; what amount of Treasure was taken in the Begum Kotee (or "Ladies' Palace") at Lucknow, shortly after the capture of that city by Lord Clyde, and what became of it; and whether there is any objection to produce the Official Correspondence which took place in India on the subject of this Booty?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the noble Lord's first Question, I have to say that no sum is now available for distribution on account of the Banda and Kirwee Booty, but it is possible that when the final account, which the Government of India has been instructed to prepare, is sent in, a small sum may be found available for a last distribution. In reply to his second Question, I have to say that the amount of the treasure found in the Ladies' Palace at Lucknow was £14,000; that treasure having been found after the cessation of hostilities was "treasure trove," not prize, and as such the property of the Government, which, however, gave a quarter of it as a reward to the finders. In reply to his third Question, I have to say that there is no objection to produce the Correspondence if the noble Lord likes to move for it.

MERCANTILE MARINE—THE "DRUID." QUESTION.

MR. HAMBRO asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will state whether he proposes to act on the recommendation of the coroner's jury and the Board of Trade Court of Inquiry, in the case of the "Druid" exploding, whereby two lives were lost, and five seamen dangerously scalded; and if he will bring in a Bill to extend to all steamers the statutory provisions as to surveys now applicable only to passenger steamers; and, whether he proposes to take any steps against the owners, under section 11 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1871, for not keeping that ship seaworthy?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, that the case of the Druid was a very bad one. The Board of Trade inquiry decided that the explosion was the result of culpable negligence on the part of the owner, but whether the negligence brought him within the Merchant Shipping Act of 1871 he was unable on his own authority to say. He had, however, referred the question to the Home Office to ascertain whether a prosecution would lie against the owners or others under that section of the Act, or in any other way. The question whether all steamers should be surveyed compulsorily as if they were passenger ships was part of a much larger question—namely, whether all ships should be so surveyed, and upon this question he could not be expected to give an answer especially as it was one of the first questions which should be considered by the Royal Commission. To-morrow probably he would be able to communicate the names of the Royal Commissioners and the exact terms of the reference.

SCOTLAND—DUMFRIES—THE ESTATE OF HANNAHFIELD—GRANT BY THE CROWN.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the presentation of the estate of Hannahfield by the Lords of the Treasury to the Magistrates and Sheriffs of Dumfries for the benefit of the inhabitants of that town, as reported in the "Times" of the 24th instant, is substantially correct; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay the Treasury Minute on the subject upon the Table?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, the statement regarding the gift of the Hannahfield property to the town of Dumfries which appeared in The Times of the 24th instant, copied from The Scotsman, is substantially correct. The last paragraph of that statement, however, is not sufficiently precise, and might convey an erroneous impression. It is as follows:—

"The intention of the husband of the late proprietor is said to have been to leave the estate for educational purposes, but he died suddenly before his will was completed."

The fact is that a draft deed which he had caused to be prepared in 1838, about three years before his death, bearing pencil corrections by himself, has been produced. Its main object is, after providing certain legacies to relations and others, to found an educational institution in Dumfries for the benefit of the neighbourhood. The Treasury decision merely gives effect to his expressed intentions. That decision was conveyed in a Treasury letter dated the 18th instant, to the Queen's and Lord Treassuror's Remembrancer in Scotland, which the noble Lord may have if he chooses to move for it.

In reply to Mr. RATHBONE,

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had learnt since he spoke the other evening that an incorrect piece of information had reached him about this vessel. It appeared that she was not registered in the Liverpool Underwriters' Association, but was registered in the London Lloyd's.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—NAVY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty a Question with respect to the Navy Estimates. He had privately informed the right hon. Gentleman that, in consequence of an impression that these Estimates would not be brought on until this day week, he had made for to-night an engagement of a public character which the right hon. Gentleman himself admitted it was almost impossible for him to forego. He quite expected from what the right hon. Gentleman said the other night that he would not enter upon any important Votes that evening. Would the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that none of the important Votes would be brought before the House that night?

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the noble Lord was totally in error. The point was this: The noble Lord had got a Notice on the Paper with regard to the Devastation, and there were two other Gentlemen who had Motions on going into Committee of Supply. They were kind enough not to bring those Motions forward on condition that they should have an equally good opportunity of doing so, and, therefore, it was said that on this day week the Navy Estimates should be placed first, when the Motions might come on, but he had no intention not to take any important Votes before Thursday next. The question, therefore, arose whether important Votes were to be postponed because the noble Lord had got an engagement for that evening? He was willing to put off Vote 3, but he could not engage to defer the others.

MR. GLADSTONE moved that the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the first seven Notices of Motion.

LORD HENRY LENNOX inquired after what hour the right hon. Gentleman would not go on with the Votes that night.

MR. GOSCHEN: Not after 11 o'clock.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, it certainly appeared to him the other night that the First Lord of the Admiralty did give the House to understand that the Navy Estimates would not be taken that night, but on next Thursday. ["Order."] The right hon. Gentleman himself must be aware that his (Sir Lawrence Palk's) noble Friend had given up his right to speak in order to suit the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman, and though it might not be right that the convenience of the House should be sacrificed to that of an hon. Member, still both sides of the House were deeply concerned in this—that faith should be kept.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the hon. Baronet had misunderstood him, and he would see that the object of the understanding that the Navy Estimates should be taken on Thursday next was that hon. Members who had postponed their Motions should have an opportunity of bringing them forward on that night.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, there appeared to be a series of misunderstandings. He would like, at all events, to be quite clear on one point. He distinctly understood the other night the right hon. Gentleman to say that when he next brought on the Navy Estimates the Committee should be at liberty to enter on the general discussion, in return for having relinquished it at the time to suit the convenience of the Government. He hoped there was no misunderstanding on that point.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government had no power whatever to modify the rules under which discussions in Committee were conducted. The general discussion was certainly waived the other night for the convenience of the Government, and it was understood to be the desire of hon. Members that there should be given an opportunity of resuming the discussion with regard to the general scale on which the Estimates were proposed. The Government were under the belief that the discussion could be raised on the Votes in question, and he trusted that would satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that what had fallen from the Prime Minister fully bore out the statements of his noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox) as to what occurred the other night. They understood that the necessities of the public service required that the Vote for men should be taken before the end of the month, and they at once acceded to this proposal. But this showed that the Government did not then anticipate that they would have another day at their disposal before the end of March for further discussion of the Navy Estimates. It was in consequence of that, that Vote 1 was agreed to, on the understanding that the general discussion on the Navy Estimates should be continued on Vote 2, a course justified by former precedents. As the month of April had not yet arrived, he trusted the other Votes would not be taken before then.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that whether Supply could be brought on to-night would depend upon the length of the discussion which would previously take place.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, the Motion which I now venture to make is for the appointment of a Committee to consider certain points connected with the procedure of this House. It will be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and of the House, that I moved this same notice by way of amendment to the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Walsall (Mr. C. Forster) on the 25th of February, whereby, had that Resolution been adopted, Parliament would have been convened in November and sat on to Christmas each year. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, then accused me of great ingenuity; an accusation which I felt conveyed a high compliment, coming as it did from that right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman said that I had managed to put two speeches into one; a speech against the motion of the right hon. Gentleman for Walsall, and a speech in support of my own amendment. I do not see myself how otherwise I could have spoken on that occasion; but the right hon. Gentleman suggested that it would be better if a Committee of the House were moved for on the whole question of Public Business, probably not being aware, or not remembering, that, by the decision of the House against the Amendment made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), at an earlier period of the Session, when the hon. Baronet moved for a Committee on the Despatch of Business, as an Amendment to the Resolution proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was not competent to me to raise that question in its fulness again, either by an Amendment or as a substantive Motion. Such, Sir, is the position which I had to meet. The right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House suggested that a Committee should be appointed, and the Notice which I have given goes as far in that direction as I understood from you, Sir, when I privately consulted you, that it is competent to me to move. I therefore ask the House to adopt this Resolution as the only means by which the desire, expressed by many hon. Members of this House, can be accomplished; that desire being that a Committee should be appointed to consider the subjects connected with the procedure of this House, which have on various occasions recently been agitated. On the part of the non-official Members of the House there is a distinct feeling of uneasiness with regard to the position in which they are now placed; and I think that a glance at the Order Book of the House must satisfy every hon. Member that the state of Business is such as must inevitably lead to a dead lock, and that the result of a dead lock can only be the sacrifice of an enormous number of the Bills which have been introduced by hon. Members, and that without, by far the greater part of these Bills, having been considered by the House. But, Sir, the mischief does not stop there. Undoubtedly, among the Bills which have been brought in by hon. Members not connected with the Government, there are some which the House would be very glad to consider; but the state of facts is this. Before I gave this Notice on the 11th of March, I had examined the Order Book, and I found that every Wednesday, the day specially appointed for the consideration and decision of the Orders introduced by non-official Members, was filled by Notices of one or more Orders up to the 16th of July. When I came to inquire at the Public Bill Office on that day, I found that, of the Bills for which leave had been given by the House to non-official Members, not less than 16 were unprinted. Several of those which were not printed at that time have since been printed and delivered to hon. Members; but what is the result? As long as the number of notices of Bills stand on the Book for Wednesdays, there is no probability of any decent number of the Bills introduced by non-official Members going through their subsequent stages. Among the many questions which are involved in the consideration of the present position of the Business of the House, this is one. Ought it to be competent to any hon. Member of the House on the 1st of March to put a Notice down for the 10th or 16th of July? Because if this practice is to prevail, it will become—indeed it is already—perfectly possible so to fill the Notice Paper that the Bills which stand for second reading early in the Session cannot be carried through their subsequent stages, owing to the manner in which every Wednesday is occupied up to the close of the Session. This, then, was the immediate cause of my giving this Notice. The House is aware of the rule with respect to Notices of Motion; no hon. Member can give a Notice of Motion beyond a month from the day on which the Notice is given; this arrangement keeps the Business, so far as notices of Motion are concerned, something within compass; but, with respect to Orders—that is, the notices of Bills—no such rule prevails; and this is one subject which I think a Committee of the House might well inquire into; because, before touching upon any further points connected with the conduct of Business by the Government, I wish the House to consider this, that the opportunities for transacting business which remain to the non-official Members—that is, the great body of the House—have been very greatly contracted. Ever since the Report of the Committee of 1861 was received, and to a considerable extent adopted by the House, step by step the opportunities for the transaction of their legislative business by the great body of the House—that is, by the non-official Members—have been greatly diminished, until, as I think I can show the House, we are approaching a point when the legislative functions of the House will be absolutely delegated to Her Majesty's Ministers for the time being. Such a consummation, Sir, would be totally at variance with the original Constitution of this House; and I am anxious that a Committee should be appointed for the purpose of considering how we, the non-official Members, the great body of the Members of the House, can, by the aid of some regulations adopted by the House, adapt our business to our present straitened position; or to use a familiar phrase, cut our coat according to our very much diminished cloth—that is, how we can get on with the business which, after consultation in a Committee—for arrangement among ourselves seems impossible—may be deemed essential. In other words, how we can fit that business into the restricted hours which remain to us each week. The matter is the more urgent because we are approaching the period when we may expect the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to evoke the Resolutions of 1869, and propose morning sittings; and when once the House has adopted these Resolutions, so that it will meet at 2 o'clock instead of at a quarter to 4, thus beginning sitting in the mornings on other days than Wednesdays; when I say this arrangement has been adopted, the effect of this, taken in conjunction with the rule against proceeding with opposed Business after half-past 12 at night, upon the position of the non-official Members comes to this, that they will only have Tuesday evening from 9 till half-past 12, and a short six hours' sitting on Wednesday, for the purpose of advancing through their several stages, whatever Bills they may have in their charge. In other words, while the House will be sitting fully 60 hours a week, the non-official Members will literally have but 9½ hours for the transaction of the whole of their legislative business. I do not wish, Sir, to make any unreasonable complaints; I make no suggestion of my own; but what I ask is this—that inasmuch as we, the non-official Members of this House, are divided by party, or separated by the floor of this House; and inasmuch as we have not the power of appointing a Committee among ourselves, that this House should itself appoint a Committee, before and in which we may consider these difficulties in which we find ourselves placed, and which may consider any means by which the time remaining to us may be best appropriated. With your permission, Sir, I will advert for a moment to some statistics relating to last Session, in illustration of what I have said. What was the state of things, then, last Session? I find that the total number of Bills introduced into the House of Commons, including Bills brought from the Lords, during the Session of 1872, was 240, of which number 120 were introduced by or on the part of the Government, and 120, the like number, by non-official Members of the House. Of the Bills introduced by Her Majesty's Government, 92 were passed into law, 27 were withdrawn or discharged, and only one rejected on a Division. Therefore, of the Bills introduced by the Government, three-fourths were passed, one-fourth, or nearly one-fourth of these Bills were withdrawn, and only one rejected. Of the 120 Bills introduced by non-official Members of the House only 30 were passed, 47 were withdrawn or discharged, 24 were dropped; that is, in all, 72 were abandoned; 18 were rejected on Divisions, and one was laid aside. Thus, while three-fourths of the Bills introduced by the Government were passed into law, the total number of their Bills being 120, not one-fourth of the 120 Bills introduced by the non-official Members of the House passed into law, and out of the 120 three-fourths were practically laid aside. I do not wish to be in the least unjust to the right hon. Gentleman the leader of this House. I do not blame him for the Government he leads in the least, because the House has placed in the hands of the Government so enormous a proportion of its legislative work, has virtually to this great extent abandoned its legislative duties to the Administration. Lord Palmerston, when he was recommending the House to adopt a Resolution of the Committee on Public Business in 1861, emphatically declared that the legislative functions of this House constituted its primary duty, and that for the discharge of that function, for the due performance of this duty beyond all others, this House was responsible to the country. He (Lord Palmerston) then proceeded to touch upon the importance of the financial duties of this House, and afterwards dwelt with considerable emphasis upon the other functions of the House, to act as the great inquest of the nation, in hearing and seeking to remedy and demanding an account for any grievance that may be felt in any part of the country; but he treated the financial function of the House, and its function with respect to grievances, as subordinate and secondary to its great function, the function of legislation. Well, Sir, it appears to me that no Government ought to desire a monopoly of the legislative power of the House; but suppose it is to be granted further than it has been already granted, what will be the result? Her Majesty's Ministers are not, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday—at the Mansion House Banquet—said, they do not constitute merely a Committee of this House. They represent another power. They represent the Executive power of the Crown and of the nation. I should deeply lament if Her Majesty's Ministers came to be considered a mere Committee of this House. I should deprecate any evasion of, or any forfeiture of the peculiar prerogatives and functions of the Crown; but take the case, as I suppose it may become, for the sake of argument that the whole legislative power of this House were in addition to their other functions vested in the Government of the day. By the constitution of the country, the Government of the day must possess the confidence of a majority of this House, and it is therefore inevitable that they must be in this House the representatives of a party. What then would result of their monopolizing the legislative power of this House? The legislation approved by one party would, during the administration or tenure of office of that party be predominant. Then would come reaction, and when that administration leaves office their successors would be found to be their political opponents, and the legislation of this House would be forced into a direction altogether opposite to its former course; thus we should get into that seesaw, which has been found to work so much mischief in the United States of America. It might come to this, that the official Members of the House would be held to be a separate class apart from the other Members of this House; that they were not merely the organs of this House, but they formed an administration, in fact, superior to and therefore irresponsible to Parliament. I think it evident, from the expressions used by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon a recent occasion, that he sees this danger and feels this difficulty; that the leader of the House is practically the organ of a party in this House; that if he became invested with the whole legislative power of this House, he could carry legislation only in one direction, and that thus we should have legislation all in one direction, as emanating from one party during their tenure of office, and that by reaction we should have legislation swaying back again in an opposite direction. I beg pardon of the House for having touched upon this subject, which is a somewhat grave one; at the same time I would that the House should consider that, in watching the progress of changes in the practice and organization of this House, we are watching a great legislative machine, which, now that the House of Lords has practically yielded its independent judgment so often to this House, does in itself possess a supreme legislative power, in other words, has become the supreme legislative power of the State. I cannot see any disorder in this House of which I have been so long a Member, without feeling deep regret. Humble Member as I am, I have never, during the 30 years I have been here, sought any object more anxious than to uphold the credit and character of the House of Commons. I have laboured to this end. I have made sacrifices for it; and I liked not the disorder which characterised the conclusion of the last Session; and it shall not be my fault if, for want of suggestions at all events, however humble may be their source, the House fails to consider its proceedings, with a view to their better regulation. I am unwilling to detain the House, but there are one or two other observations that I wish to make. What is the number of Bills which have been introduced into this House by non-official Members in the present Session? I am afraid it is almost as large as the number introduced last Session. Now the objection to this is that by the introduction of such an enormous number of Bills the non-official Members of this House obstruct each other. In short it becomes a game, not of legislation but of obstruction, and nothing can be more unwholesome than this. It wastes both the time and the energies of the House. I have observed that, since the adoption of the restrictions which recent standing orders have placed on the opportunities for moving Amendments in Supply, the tendency of hon. Members has been to multiply the number of Bills before the House; and I feel convinced, when I see a notice for the second reading of some Bills given at the end of February for the 16th of July following, that that Bill stands there without any hope whatever, on the part of the hon. Member who introduced it, that it can pass into law, but that he merely means to treat it as a kind of Notice of Motion, as a kind of peg upon which to hang a statement or declamation. The more this practice prevails, the more our proceedings must be crippled, and the less capable must the House become of acting, to any degree, independently of the administration of the day in the discharge of its first function, that of legislation. During the last Session there were certain occasions on which the energy of the leader of this House prompted him on Friday night to convene the House unexpectedly to sit on Saturday, and this without notice, save that given the night before. One of the subjects which a Committee might consider is what notice should be given of any proposal to change the hour appointed for the meeting of the House, and what notice should be given of any alteration in the order of business appointed for each day. The object of Committee would be to make suggestions that may be worthy of the consideration of the House, for regulating its Business, and for so economising the time allotted to the great body of this House, the non-official Members, that we may be able to transact the business committed to us in a more orderly, a more expeditious, and a more efficient manner than last Session; for the House should not forget that some of Her Majesty's Judges have expressed many strong opinions with regard to the slovenly manner in which statutes, sent down to them for their guidance, have been passed through Parliament. I trust that I shall be excused for having enlarged upon this subject. I will conclude by expressing a hope that the right hon. Gentleman the head of the Government and leader of the House, will carry out the expectation which I, not without reason, have hopefully entertained, by sanctioning this proposal for the appointment of a Committee of this House to consider those points in the procedure of this House, which are comprised in the Resolution.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in seconding the Motion, said, he believed that the general sense of the House was very much in accord with the views of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) who had brought forward this Motion. For his own part he agreed in the main with what his hon. Friend had said respecting the limitation during the last two years of the right of private Members to bring forward their Bills. He perhaps did not attach so much importance as the hon. Member to measures initiated by private Members. He was of opinion that the usefulness of private Members depended more on their action in bringing forward Motions on subjects in which their constituents were interested—bringing these Motions forward not, perhaps, with the hope of their resulting in immediate legislation, but with the view of giving a spur to the Government and the House by showing them what the feelings of the constituencies were upon various subjects, and thus paving the way for legislation. But it could not be denied that private Members were very much limited as to their opportunities for action even in that respect, and he quite agreed that it was desirable that something should be done to improve their position. The Business of the House increased from year to year. Tuesday morning sittings were becoming more frequent; the Tuesday night sittings were practically the only times private Members had of bringing forward their Motions; and on Tuesday nights private Members were often counted out. If the power of private Members to raise discussions were a valuable one, the curtailment of it ought to be carefully guarded. He did not think the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was sufficient to meet the necessities of the case, for in any change in the mode of conducting the Business of the House, it should be dealt with as a whole and on the broadest possible basis. He was afraid that the terms of the Motion might, unless some facility were given to hon. Members for moving instructions to the Committee, very much limit the scope of the inquiry. He should, therefore, like the inquiry to be enlarged, and certain points which had only been hinted at thoroughly thrashed out. Among these were the appointment of Grand Committees for certain Bills, the alteration of Notices of Motion with private Members' Bills on Wednesdays, which would obviate the temptation to talk out private Members' Bills on that day, and the securing of Fridays to private Members. He thought that the best mode of dealing with the whole Question was to refer it to a Committee, and he trusted the instruction to the Committee would be enlarged so as to secure the consideration of these points.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the time of the day at which the House should assemble, the hours during which the House can most conveniently sit for the transaction of Public Business, when the Business introduced by Her Majesty's Ministers should have precedence, and what Notice should be given of any proposal to alter the time at which the House will assemble, or the distribution of Business."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. DODSON said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire that it was most desirable that the Government should not monopolize too much of the time of the House, whilst he also agreed that it was most desirable that Motions brought forward by private Members should have ample opportunity of being discussed. Discussions of this kind were exceedingly useful. They expressed public opinion from different parts of the country, and discussions in the House helped to form a sound public opinion out-of-doors. It was also desirable that there should be sufficient time for the consideration of the principal Bills of private Members when introduced. He could not, however, agree with the hon. Member in thinking it desirable that the Bills introduced by private Members should be greatly multiplied.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The right hon. Gentleman has quite misunderstood me. I deprecated the number being increased.

MR. DODSON was glad to hear the hon. Member say so. But the hon. Member, while deprecating the lack of time for the due consideration of the

Bills of private Members, used a curious illustration, for he referred to the comments of Judges on the vagueness of certain Acts which he complained had been hurried through the House, and it so happened that they were Government and not private Members' measures. A Notice which had been put on the Paper by the right hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) seemed to offer a short cut to the end the hon. Member for North Warwickshire desired to obtain. The effect of it would be to give Fridays to private Members; and if they had Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Fridays—three days out of five—it would be as much as could possibly be accorded them. The House would dispose of that Motion after discussion, and without the intervention of a Committee, and the new rule could come into effect during the present Session. He (Mr. Dodson) had before suggested that the Business of Tuesdays and Wednesdays should be transposed; that Orders of the Day should stand first on Tuesdays, and Motions on Wednesdays. Private Members' Bills would not then be exposed to their present risk on Wednesdays of being "talked out;" but they would run the risk of their Bills on Tuesdays being counted out. If a Bill attracted so little interest that 40 Members would not be found willing to come down to support it, the probability was that it had better be counted out. This arrangement and the making Friday a Motion night would give more time to private Members, and might facilitate the passing of their Bills, and both these were among the objects which the hon. Member had in view. Neither of them, however, would come within the terms of reference of the hon. Gentleman's Motion, which applied only to hours, and not to the nature of Business. As far as he was concerned he had very little hope of any good resulting from the appointment of another Committee. A great number of Committees had already sat, and if the hon. Gentleman wanted the recommendation of a Committee there were numberless recommendations lying in the library which he might take up. He believed that the Committee now proposed would be of less use than any of them, and he thought the object of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would be better attained by the proposition of the right hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt).

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said that the great loss of time occurred through the House being counted out on Tuesdays. He was very nearly being a sufferer himself last Tuesday, when the Prime Minister suggested that he should go on with his motion on the Suez Canal. He, however, felt certain that the House would be counted, which happened as soon as an hon. Member opposite (Mr. Chadwick) rose to bring forward a Motion on the Income Tax. Between 8 and 10 o'clock on Tuesdays the House was almost always counted. If, however, the Government would put down Supply or some other Government business on the Paper, the House would then be safe to be kept. As the right hon. Gentleman had been so kind in advising him to go on last Tuesday, perhaps he would give him the assurance that he would be in his place next Tuesday and keep a House for him.

MR. COLLINS thought that if a question brought forward by any hon. Member would not attract forty Members, its fate could hardly be deplored; and he thought it would be well to lay down the rule that if an hon. Member were once counted out he should not be allowed to bring on the same Motion during that Session. It was no offence to the Colonies when an hon. Gentleman opposite was counted out, but only an intimation that the House did not think any good object could be gained by the discussion of the subject. When, however, that hon. Member was counted out, a great injury was inflicted upon the next hon. Member, who might have a sensible Motion on the paper, because the first Motion not only stopped the way, but emptied the House. The other night the hon. Member (Mr. Chadwick) was counted out in moving for a Committee on the Income Tax. The House knew very well that the tax could not be modified, but that it must either be got rid of or retained, and, therefore, the House knew it was only a waste of time to go on. He thought the House showed great good sense in refusing to entertain Motions of this kind. Out of the three recommendations of the Committee of last Session two had been adopted to the satisfaction of the House—one that Mondays should be given to the Government, and another that no opposed business should be taken after midnight. The third—that a quarter of an hour's grace should be allowed before the Speaker counted, when the House resumed at 9 after a morning sitting—had not yet been adopted.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the subject was now being discussed, partly on the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) and partly upon a suggestion made by his right hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson) for improving the conduct of the Business of the House. It was difficult to deal satisfactorily in debate with these proposals, and it was hardly possible to bring them to a state of maturity until after they had passed through the ordeal of a Select Committee. These matters required to be looked at on different sides, and it was conversation rather than speeches which enabled them to undergo the thorough sifting which they required before they were adopted. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) had made a suggestion which had been received with more than common favour, that there should be an exchange of the Business of Tuesdays and Wednesdays. A great deal might be said in favour of that Motion, but he doubted whether it would be safe to adopt it without carefully examining it from every side, because it clearly involved casting a weight in the scale in favour of Notices of Motion as compared with the legislation undertaken by private Members. It gave to Members who moved Notices of Motion six hours of an absolutely certain House. [MR. HUNT dissented.] Yes, practically it did, because from 12 to 4 the House could not be counted. [MR. HUNT: But will you make a House?] Sometimes there might be half an hour lost before a House was made, and there was that deduction between the hours from 12 to 4, but when London was full there was no difficulty whatever in keeping a House between 4 and 6 o'clock. That would give, practically, five or six hours certain to those who had Notices of Motion. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to repay the promoters of private Bills by giving them Tuesdays—which would be subject to risks. That was a change of great importance which required to be carefully weighed because the interest of these two classes was very distinct one from the other. He thought it would not be imprudent to say that the whole of these suggestions required to be turned over and examined on every side. It had been charged upon the Government of the day that it had of late years made encroachments upon private Members. He questioned the truth of this assertion. If hon. Members went back 20 or 30 years, he was ready to affirm that, apart from morning sittings, the Government 20 or 30 years ago had a much larger proportion of the aggregate number of hours than at present, and that the encroachment had not been by, but upon the Government. In 1867 or 1868, when the rule was made for morning sittings, the inequality was so far removed as to bring matters back to the state in which they formerly were. While private Members squabbled with the Government and the Government with private Members, the cardinal difficulty lay in the quantity of business and the fixed quantity of time to do it in, and it was to the economical distribution of that time to which the House would have to look, rather than from any great advantage to be gained by private Members at the expense of the Government. He thought it would be worth while to appoint a Committee of the House to consider the subject anew, but there was no use in raising the question if hours were to be spent in debating it and in withdrawing the attention of the House from other business. He thought there would be no advantage in agreeing to this motion, and that for two reasons. In the first place, as had been said by the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) it would be impossible to limit the Committee in the manner proposed by this Motion. It had been suggested that, not by one but by a series of instructions, the scope of the Committee should be made wider. But that showed that the form of the Motion was a wrong one, and if a Committee were appointed, it ought to be appointed with much greater confidence in its discretion than the Motion showed. In the next place, he ventured to say that this was not a time of the Session at which such a Committee could be appointed with any advantage. A Committee on the Business of the House ought only to be appointed at a period of the Session when hon. Members of the House were so free from engagements that the members of the Committee could be chosen unrestrictedly from the Members of the House. It ought to have the power of bringing together all those hon. Members who had been most responsible for the conduct of the Business of the House, and who had had the longest experience. If a Committee were appointed after Easter when a large majority of hon. Members whose assistance was most desirable were already so occupied with previous engagements, they would not be able to do justice to the inquiry. His hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane) had complained of the request which was made to him to proceed with his Motion about the Isthmus of Suez on Tuesday night, but he (Mr. Gladstone) believed that if his hon. Friend had stood in the breach he would have kept a House. The hon. Member had also suggested a change by which the Government Orders should have precedence on Tuesday nights. [Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Should not have precedence.] The hon. Member's proposition amounted to this—that the Government, without any hope of bringing on their Business, should place it on the Paper, in the hope that official Members would be bound to keep a House. The hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) had proposed that they should make a slight change with respect to the Rule that was to be enforced when the House recommenced its sittings at 9 o'clock, and stated that a quarter of an hour's grace should be given. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not know whether it was wise to have a Rule that on such occasions no Motions should be made to count out the House before half-past 9, instead of a Rule permitting the making of a Motion to count-out at a quarter-past 9; but the House had experienced the advantage of requiring a pause before a Motion for a count-out could be made on such occasions. As to the general subject, he hoped the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would not ask the House to Divide on his Motion.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, he was doubtful whether it would be desirable to transfer to Wednesday the business now transacted on Tuesday evening. If that had been done before last Tuesday, the consequence would have been that the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford), and other mercantile Members, would not have been able to be present at the important discussion on the currency question. He thought it deserved consideration whether the present system was not better than the one now suggested. One of the results of the deliberations of the last Committee was the adoption of the half-past 12 o'clock rule, which stood in the way of private Members, and seemed to him a change of very doubtful advantage. Another change recommended by the Committee was that at the evening sitting the House should not be counted out before a quarter-past or—as subsequently suggested by the Government—half-past 9, and of that proposal he approved. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), he trusted that it would not be pressed to a division.

COLONEL BARTELOT asked the hon. Member for North Warwickshire not to divide on the question. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that it would be much better to have an inquiry at the commencement of a Session, when the whole subject could be gone into. As to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins), he thought that at 9 o'clock a quarter of an hour's grace might be fairly allowed; but he should object to any extension of that time.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN said, he was afraid they were attempting an impossibility. Looking at the number of Bills before the House, he did not think that any Committee or any change of system would facilitate legislation to the extent imagined by some hon. Members. The other day he counted the number of Bills awaiting discussion which had been brought in by hon. Members. He found there were no fewer than 66 Bills on the Order Book. Each of those Bills would be discussed three times, and upwards of 190 days would be required for that work. He had not counted the Notices of Motion, but they were very numerous. It was clearly impossible that all of them could be considered and passed through their various stages in the time at the disposal of the House. The truth was, that the measures introduced by private Members impeded each other, and would continue to do so under any system that had been suggested. The only thing that would facilitate the passage of a portion of them would be the withdrawal of the rest. He did not think that a Committee could, with advantage, be appointed at the present period of the Session, nor did he think that it would be desirable to appoint a Committee at all until they had before them some more definite proposition than they had at present. No hon. Member had made a better suggestion on this subject than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson). He concurred with the Prime Minister in thinking that a House would have been kept on Tuesday if the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had proceeded with his Motion. The reason why the House was counted out was that nobody took an interest in the Motion of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Chadwick). He did not see any use in the Committee proposed by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Numbers of hon. Members would be deprived of the opportunity of taking part in discussions if Wednesday were made the day for Motions. If, however, a substantive proposal were made to that effect, it might be discussed and decided by the House without the intervention of a Committee, as to the undesirability of appointing which, he agreed with the Prime Minister. Business had so increased that its discharge was almost impossible under any rules unless, as he had stated, hon. Members, whose Bills had no chance of passing, would at once withdraw them—a course, however, which it was hopeless to expect, every hon. Member naturally thinking his own Bill an important one.

MR. CHADWICK trusted the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would not withdraw his Motion, and urged that the main point should be to check the gross waste of time occasioned by the hon. Member for Boston and others, who appeared to think the House was burning to learn their sentiments on every subject. The Committee should be instructed to consider some mode of limiting the speeches of hon. Members to subjects which they understood, or could give some information upon. With regard to the count-out on Tuesday night, the income tax was a subject which he had studied for years, and he had intended to combat the heresies of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting it. There was scarcely any subject which they could not count-out between the hours of 8 and 10. He could himself have counted out the House 20 times during the past Session when important questions were under consideration. When it was considered that they printed and published the names of hon. Members who voted for or against any Motion, he saw no reason why they should not print and publish the names, not only of those who were present when the House was counted, but of those hon. Members who moved a count. Why should they conceal the name of any hon. Member who thought the exigencies of the public service required a count? He trusted the Committee would be appointed, and that the main question for their consideration would be how they could restrict the large amount of useless talk which was at present indulged in by hon. Members.

MR. SCOURFIELD thought that, unless the Committee had particular instructions as to the object with which they had to deal, they might meet 20 times without being able to form any definite plan. He was afraid that if they were required to solve the problem of how the Public Business could be best despatched, and, at the same time, secure unlimited liberty of debate for hon. Members, they would be placed in great difficulty.

MR. CRAWFORD pointed out that Friday nights would be more available to private Members but for the rule against more than one division on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply. He thought that a good deal of the inconvenience which now existed would be removed if the House fell back on the old rule of moving that the House, at its rising, should adjourn until Monday. With regard to the project for bringing forward Motions on Wednesdays instead of Tuesdays, he wished to remind the House that it was quite impossible for those hon. Members who were engaged in the City or professionally occupied to come down to the morning sittings.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he was not in favour of the form of Motion now brought forward, because he thought they were too much in the habit of submitting matters to Select Committees which ought to be taken into consideration by the House itself. He could not avoid saying, however, that there were a vast number of Resolutions brought forward unnecessarily, and simply for the purpose of airing eccentricities, or with the intention of showing persons outside that their authors were attempting to do something. If hon. Gentlemen would read through the lists from time to time of the Resolutions to be proposed, they would not say they were nonsense, because that would be unparliamentary language; but some censorious person would say that the House of Commons, which ought to be engaged in most important business, was occupied too frequently in discussing that which might be occasionally instructive, sometimes extremely amusing, but which almost always ended in nothing. If hon. Gentlemen—acting upon the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten)—would be considerate enough, when there was Public Business to be done, to withdraw the advocacy of their conundrums, the House would be able to make progress with and to facilitate real business. He had frequently heard the expression "free discussion" used, but he thought the liberty of free discussion might be carried a little too far when important Public Business was waiting to be transacted. Perhaps it was complimentary, or perhaps it was not complimentary to that House, but he was of opinion that kindly forbearance on its part with reference to the agitation of unimportant questions was a little too indulgent. Some time ago a novel was published bearing the title of Thinks I to Myself, thinks I, and very often in the course of a debate he had said—"Thinks I to myself, thinks I, what a pity it is that the time of the House is wasted in this manner." There were many hon. Members who were in love with their own ideas, and who insisted on inculcating them in the House of Commons, and the consequence was that at the end of the Session but little real business had been transacted. He had made these observations in the hope of "showing ourselves up to ourselves," and he trusted that hon. Members would take them to heart. He wished to hold up the mirror to those hon. Gentlemen who were the habitués of the House of Commons, and knew what the Rules were. The proceedings at a count-out could not be described as "disgraceful," because that also was not a Parliamentary expression. He was in the House the other evening when he was informed there would be a count-out on Mr. A, B, C, or D's Motion, and upon asking why, he got no answer. He however saw the exhibition. One hon. Gentleman rose up and observed that there were not 40 Members present. What did the hon. Gentleman then do? Why, he walked out at the door, and a number of other hon. Gentlemen trooped after him, and through that glass door were certain eyes peeping, all anxious that the count-out should be successful. It struck him as a most extraordinary proceeding that the very man who said there were not 40 Members present should be the first to run out of the House. That sort of thing was not only known out-of-doors, but it was ridiculed and condemned, and it was condemned with perfect propriety. It was very desirable, in his opinion, that a Rule should be made to the effect that after an hon. Member rose to draw attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present, no hon. Gentleman should be allowed to leave the House until after the count had taken place.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE agreed that the question of counting-out the House had attracted the attention of the public, but he thought it was not desirable that an impression should go abroad which should make hon. Gentlemen appear worse than they were. The speech of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Chadwick) was calculated to produce a false impression, because the hon. Gentleman had put it forward broadly that there was no business, however important, upon which the House could not be counted-out between the hours of 8 and 10 on any evening. Undoubtedly it sometimes happened that on Government nights there were not at a certain hour of the evening 40 Members in the House; but if an attempt were made to count-out it would be found that there were plenty of Members within the walls of the building, and who would come in and make a House to prevent such an attempt being successful. It must be understood that Government business ran no risk of being got rid of by a count-out. The Government always could and always did keep a House for really important business; and if the business brought forward by private Members sometimes suffered from a "count," it was generally because there was not a sufficient number of hon. Members interested in it to keep a House together, though sometimes the result, as was the case the other night, was due to accident.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in reply, said: Sir, there is a modern invention connected with railways, the application of which has conduced much to secure the public safety, and it is known as the "block signal." And to day, I think I have at all events shown the House a block signal with respect to its own proceedings and business. I regret that it does not appear to be the inclination of the House, by a majority, to adopt the Resolution which I have proposed with a view to considering how the Public Business may be liberated. I feel the truth of what has been so ably stated by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, that whatever may be the value of any suggestion made for the improvement of the proceedings of this House, unless it has first been sifted by a Committee, it will not ultimately be adopted by the House. For years past no suggestion has been adopted by the House with reference to its procedure that has not been first recommended by a Committee; for this reason I acted upon the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman by proposing the appointment of a Committee. But, as he conceives that the terms of the Motion, limited as they are by the circumstances of the case; by the fact that the proposal for the appointment of a Committee on the whole subject of the Business of the House, has already this Session been negatived, and that I am precluded by the Rules of the House from renewing that Motion, I suggested the proposal which is now before the House, fully convinced that, unless the discussion which has taken place has some influence upon hon. Members, the "block" in the business of the non-official Members of the House, which I have endeavoured to describe, must continue, and many of the Bills they have introduced, probably some of those most worthy of consideration, must lapse for this Session, because their course is obstructed by other measures that have far less claim upon the attention of the House. I will not risk again, and more finally, precluding the House from entertaining the propriety of appointing a Committee to consider the state of its business, and the necessity for effecting some alteration in its proceedings, by taking a Division. With respect to an observation which has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson), I would say that I hope he will not make his suggestion for an improvement in the proceedings of this House, without submitting it to a Committee, unless he is very confident that he has secured a majority in his favour beforehand. Few Members are more competent to deal with this subject than that right hon. Gentleman; but great as his authority may be, and however valuable may be his suggestions, I fear that, unless it be backed by the recommendation of a Committee, he is not likely to attain his object. I will no longer detain the House than to ask its leave to withdraw the Motion, lest, by its rejection on a Division, the House should find itself obstructed in consideration of the question hereafter, as it becomes more pressing with the advance of the Session; and I believe that it will become more pressing as the Session advances.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—RULES OF THE ROAD AT SEA.—RESOLUTION.

MR. G. BENTINCK, in rising to call the attention of the House to the present inefficient state of the 'rules of the road at sea,' as regards the common practice of propelling steam vessels at a high rate of speed at night and in thick weather; and to move—

said, the object he had was to obtain legislation the effect of which would be a considerable saving of life. If he could show that the want of certain rules and regulations, or Acts of Parliament—whichever might be required for the purpose—was the cause of an annual loss of human life, he thought it would be the duty of the Government to deal with the question. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to what occurred last year when

this question was brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay). The right hon. Gentleman opposed that Motion upon the ground that great inconvenience, possibly great risk, might arise if any attempt were made to change what were termed the 'rules of the road at sea,' after their being adopted by all the principal countries of Europe. In the present Motion he (Mr. Bentinck) did not ask for any alteration of the existing 'rule of the road,' but simply that a slight addition should be made to those rules, and if his suggestion should be adopted by the Government of this country, it could be made applicable to their own coasts, where it was chiefly required. If it should be adopted by other nations so much the better, but if not their rules would remain as they were. At any rate there would be greater security on their own coasts. The facts of the case were clear and simple, and they did not require the slightest knowledge of nautical matters upon the part of hon. Members to understand them. The practice on their own coasts where steamers abounded was to drive those steamers day and night and in thick and dark weather at the highest possible rate of speed, in order to curtail the time occupied in their voyages as much as possible. Now it was clear that the practice which he complained of must end in a great annual sacrifice of human life. He would not trouble the House with figures, but the Returns of the Board of Trade upon the subject showed that the practice led to many fatal consequences. What he complained of was that there was no law against the practice, the result of which in some cases might come under the head of misdemeanour, and there ought to be a law by which persons could be punished for the consequences of their acts. The present was a state of things which ought not to exist in a civilized country, for it led to a wanton sacrifice of human life. It was true there were stringent regulations in existence as to keeping a good lookout on board ships, but if steamers were driven in thick weather and in crowded waters, at a great rate of speed, those regulations were practically useless. Ought the present state of things to be allowed to continue? The secretary of Lloyd's stated, and the statement was quoted in the House last year by his

hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay), that whilst the number of sailing vessels had increased 9 per cent, and the collisions had increased by 7 per cent, the number of steamers had increased 39 per cent, and the number of collisions by 39½ per cent. That showed that the collisions were mainly attributable to the number of steamers running on our own coast, and if that was the case, was there any possible ground upon which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Forster) could refuse to deal with the subject, and to take such steps as would prevent that great annual sacrifice of human life which, according to the Returns in the right hon. Gentleman's own possession, undoubtedly resulted from the practice to which he was referring. He might be asked why steamers ran the risk they necessarily did in steaming up and down our coast at such excessive speed in all weathers and under all circumstances that it was a mere matter of chance whether or not a collision would occur? The simple reason was that, in regard to the voyages of those steamers, as in all other commercial operations, time was money; and every half hour that was lost on their passage was so much out of the owner's pocket. He assumed that right hon. Gentlemen would not deny the facts which he had stated. There was no difficulty in dealing with the subject, because it was not necessary to alter the 'rules of the road,' but only to make an addition to those rules, which he could confine solely to our own coasts, where the grievance complained of principally existed. He maintained that it was the bounden duty of the Government to deal with the subject, and if they failed to do so they would be virtually responsible hereafter for every life lost on our coast by the practice to which he had referred. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That in the opinion of this House other regulations are required, with a view to the better avoidance of the annual great loss of life and of property which is caused by the want of more stringent regulations on the subject."—
(Mr. Bentinck.)

SIR JOHN HAY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had brought that subject forward with the weight and ability which belonged to him, and also with the great experience of the sea which that eminently English sport, yachting, of which he was so great a master, had conferred upon him. That question was not one that required any great discussion. The House had already been put in possession of the facts of the great loss of life caused by the imperfect regulations for navigation which now exist. He had himself had the honour of suggesting in the papers of the House certain changes in the wording of the present 'rules of the road at sea,' but he was by no means wedded to the particular changes he had submitted. Last year, when he introduced that subject, every hon. Member of the House who had served in the Navy, with a single exception, was of opinion that a Committee should be appointed. It was said that a Committee of that House was, perhaps, not the best tribunal to decide such a question, and there was some force in that observation; but it was true that there was some great objection in the Department to making or considering the changes which were requisite. In former years it had been opposed by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), when President of the Board of Trade, and also by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Fortescue), upon information given by that Department. But last year his Motion for an inquiry was supported by two former Presidents of the Board of Trade, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote), and the right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave), who both, with their knowledge of that Department, thought there was an opportunity for further investigation so as to save life and property at sea. The principal argument put forward by the Department was that those rules, whether perfect or imperfect, having been adopted by all nations, there would be very great inconvenience in making any change without the sanction of all nations who were parties to the agreement. But two of the principal nations who were parties to the agreement had themselves suggested that the present rules were imperfect. It was true that after making changes France and the United States of America gave way to the urgency of our Board of Trade; and, looking to this country as possessing the greatest mercantile marine, said that as great inconvenience would arise at sea from any change made by themselves, they would not force them on the world without the sanction of England. The correspondence on the subject showed that the United States had withdrawn the alterations, which they thought necessary, not because they believed they would not conduce to the safety of shipping, but out of deference to our Board of Trade. Again, in the opinion of France, two of the rules now in force were a source of considerable danger. When two considerable Maritime Powers like the United States and France pointed out changes which they thought necessary for the safety of shipping, and only withdrew their endeavours to effect them owing to the numerical superiority of our mercantile marine, and their belief that these things must be carefully weighed by us, with the disposition to make prudent changes when they were shown to be necessary, surely it was time for the Board of Trade to cause inquiries to be made as to whether they were necessary or not? He had already quoted in the House many naval officers of eminence, to whose opinions weight and authority attached, who said that the rules now existing were the source of danger, and that change was necessary. He might allude to Admiral Sir Alexander Milne, the present First Sea Lord, an officer of the highest character and the greatest experience, to Commodore de Horsey, to Captain Colomb, than whom no one's opinion was more entitled to consideration, and Admiral Randolph. All these officers thought some change was necessary, though he was bound to admit they did not fully concur in the amendment he proposed. He must also allude to another sea-officer, Mr. Stirling Jason, who had put himself in communication with the naval authorities and the representatives of the commercial marines of six or seven of the principal Maritime Powers of Europe, and they all concurred in saying that change was necessary for the safety of life and property at sea. We know that in 10 years 1,000 lives had been lost through collisions alone, which was at the rate of 100 a year; and surely such a sacrifice of life deserved the attention of Parliament? A suggestion he would offer was that the Royal Commission which it was understood was about to inquire into the safety of life and property at sea should have this cognate subject referred to it. The decisions of such a commission would carry great weight, and he was sure they would be accepted not only by the ship-owners and masters of England, but by the mercantile marine of the United States and France, and indeed by the navies of the world.

MR. SAMUDA said, he recognized the importance of the subject, and concurred in the belief that the number of collisions was on the increase; but he was not certain whether the real defect in the rules, which was the cause of many collisions, was correctly apprehended. The rules directed that when steamers were meeting each other, each should port its helm—that is, move away to the right. That, he admitted, would secure safety when they saw each other's green and red lights, or each other's red lights only, but when they saw each other's green light—that is, the light on the right, then porting the helm in nine cases out of ten brought them into collision. It was important to consider whether this rule should not be varied, and whether steamers, under these circumstances, should not be directed to stand still. It would not be wise for Parliament to interfere with the discretion of captains as to the speed with which their steamers made their trips; but, as non-observance of the rule now involved liability for payment of damages, and observance of the rule caused collisions, we ought to consider whether some change could not be made in it.

MR. T. E. SMITH thought that the Motion of the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), in the form in which he had put it before the House, must receive support from all hon. Members, and even be accepted by the President of the Board of Trade. Whether collisions occurred from errors in the regulation or not, it was known that a large number of collisions were due to too rapid steaming in thick weather. He had crossed the Atlantic with a captain who rather boasted that in one trip in a fog he had run a ship down, and in 22 minutes after the collision was steaming away with every member of the shipwrecked crew on his steamer—an incident which he spoke of simply as a clever feat. It was no secret that ships sometimes steamed at full speed through fog all the way from Liverpool to New York. He had heard it said that it was a common practice among captains on our eastern coast to keep driving up and down during the prevalence of fogs. If the Board of Trade were to visit with condign punishment every breach of the rules which resulted in collisions, he felt convinced the number of lives lost at sea would be considerably diminished. As for the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay), from inquiries he had made he found that it met with little approval from the Mercantile Marine. It was highly important to have a uniform rule, universally accepted by all maritime nations, and one that should be strenuously acted upon.

MR. LIDDELL said, he understood that the fact of a steamer not having a look-out did not constitute a positive offence against the law. If the information he had received were correct, the crews of large steamers running coastwise were very often in such a condition that they were unable to keep a look out. Their physical condition, arising from fatigue and sometimes from drink, incapacitated them from doing so. In these days steamers made rapid voyages, and were speedily reladen, so that the crews often left port in a weary and worn-out condition. Indeed, he had seen it stated that, soon after a ship left a port, it frequently happened that not a single man on board was awake with the exception of the steerer. Such being the case, it was no wonder that collisions constantly occurred. Moreover, it had been stated that none but passenger and mail steamers kept a look-out, as a rule, when at sea. Surely a stringent law ought to be laid down to compel every ship to keep a look-out? Again, it was an almost incomprehensible thing that in a maritime country like ours there should be no distinction between the danger signal and the signal for a pilot. This was one of the causes which contributed to the fearful calamity to the Northfleet off Dungeness, which was so fresh in their recollection. Several vessels were in the neighbourhood of that ill-fated ship, and might have rendered assistance to her, but it was thought the signals she made were merely for a pilot. Surely this was a matter which might be easily remedied, and that in concert with other maritime nations, and he trusted it would receive serious attention from the Board of Trade.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, no one could be more anxious than he was to take every means within the power or the invention of the Government in order to diminish the loss of life and property at sea, but the practical question was how far these matters were within the power of legislation and Parliament. The matter was not so easy of practical solution as some people in their ardour imagined; but that was no reason why the best efforts of the Government should not be directed to that end, and so far as he was concerned, they should be so directed. The general question of the 'rules of the road at sea,' though not included in the terms of the Motion, had been raised by the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir John Hay), but he regretted that he was not able to take the view that had been propounded. Without going into the question, he would rest the opposition which he deemed it his bounden duty to give to any re-opening of our present system as to those 'rules of the road at sea,' on the ground so well put by the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Smith). As far as he was concerned this was necessarily a question of authority and of agreement between the maritime nations of the world. Now, the vast preponderance of authority, both theoretical and practical, was much more in favour of the rules as they stood than of those which the hon. and gallant Baronet wished to substitute for them. The present rules were settled, after a great amount of care and consideration, by agreement with the other Maritime Powers, chiefly in consequence of the exertions of one of his predecessors in the Presidency of the Board of Trade—Mr. Milner Gibson. It was under that gentleman's personal direction that the Code was brought to its present state and received the sanction of all the maritime nations of the world. Certainly, he could not consent to reopen the question now by any expression of opinion in favour of a change, or by referring the rules to a Royal Commission, which would have plenty of other matters to consider. The real object of the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) was the attainment of some change in the law, though what that change should be was not clearly expressed, but it seemed to refer to some increased stringency in the regulations, with a view to diminish the number of collisions by checking the practice of driving steamers at a high speed. There was nothing in the hon. Member's motion to prepare him for any particular kind of legislation, and he could hardly be expected to give positive advice to the House on a proposition he had never heard before. As he understood the proposal, it was that every breach of the rules forbidding a high rate of speed should be made a criminal offence. The hon. Member omitted, however, to state that a penalty was inflicted now for a breach of the regulations. One of these regulations was to the effect that ships under steam were to slacken speed when approaching another vessel, and, if necessary, stop and reverse; that in a fog they should go at a moderate speed. Surely this rule was clear and intelligible enough? As to the observance of the rules, the Merchant Shipping Act provided that captains who did not obey them should be deemed guilty of misdemeanour, and their ships should be adjudged in default. He admitted that prosecutions for misdemeanour in those cases were difficult, and the difficulty was increased by the absence of a public prosecutor in this country. But, independently of the proof of misdemeanour, proof of the breach of these rules was attended with important consequences to the ship, and secured her condemnation, which in itself was a serious penalty. As to the suggestion of further legislation for the purpose of preventing collisions, he had in preparation a Bill which, without pledging himself as to the particular mode of meeting the question which had been raised by the hon. Gentleman opposite, contained what he hoped would prove acceptable provisions on this subject. One of these provisions would for the first time render it a criminal offence on the part of the master of any ship to act in the disgraceful way in which the master of the ship—whoever he might be—that ran down the Northfleet conducted himself. An attempt was once made by the late Lord Kingsdown to render that conduct criminal, but it was resisted by other legal authorities in the other House. However, he (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) was now in consultation with the Law Officers of the Crown upon it, and felt confident they would be able to propose a change in the law which would for the future render such acts criminal.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE resuming, said, the Bill now being prepared also contained clauses for providing an improved system of danger signals. It was not so easy as some persons might imagine to devise danger signals which should be of a thoroughly simple and practical kind, as they must be, and yet not capable of being confounded with ordinary signals for pilots. It was necessary to consult with parties having special knowledge on the subject, but after a great deal of time had been thus necessarily occupied, a large amount of agreement had been secured as to the simple form of signals which would be proposed in the Bill. These signals had been laid before foreign maritime countries through the Foreign Office, and had been assented to by Holland, Italy, France, Greece, and the United States. They would not consist of a coloured light as suggested. The adoption of a system of coloured lights would be dangerous, as there never could be any certainty that a vessel in danger would have a store of that particular kind of light; and if the means of making a danger signal could not be relied on for all conceivable occasions the danger was increased instead of diminished. He could not venture off-hand upon an opinion respecting the particular addition to the 'rules of the road' in respect of collisions, of which he had heard for the first time to-night. The subject, however, should have his best attention, and he should be glad if he could see his way to any increased stringency of rule. His opposition to change in the general 'rule of the road at sea' was founded upon a concurrence of authority against it; and he could not undertake to re-open the question by referring it to the Royal Commission. He had a recent conversation with a gentleman cognisant of this matter who said that in an interview with the late Dr. Lushington, that distinguished jurist said not long before his death—"Never allow the 'rule of the road at sea' to be altered;" and as far as the experience of the Court of Admiralty went, he had never been able to hear of vessels lost through the observance of the rule; they were lost, if not by accident, then through the violation of the rule.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS thought that this was a question upon which the House wanted practical information, and as a practising Barrister he had had much to do with these rules. From the experience he had thus acquired in collision cases, he had found that the rules were most embarrassing, and he had also found that, besides their being embarrassing, if they were regularly and invariably adopted, the two vessels which were meeting were certain to come into collision. If the order to port the helm was obeyed in certain cases a collision was a dead certainty. His experience had convinced him that the Rules should be revolutionized, and he adopted that term advisedly. Seeing that a Royal Commission had been authorized for the purpose of inquiring into loss of life in consequence of the unseaworthiness of vessels, was anything more reasonable than that this question of the loss of life by collisions, which was a cognate subject, and involved in the other, should be inquired into at the same time? He ventured to say that if they looked to the archives of the Admiralty Court and to the decisions of Dr. Lushington or other Judges they would find that these very 'rules of the road' had received different interpretations and that they had embarrassed the Judges in that Court and Judges and juries in the Courts of Common Law. He agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) in thinking that it would be impolitic to regulate the rates of speed by Act of Parliament, and it would not be for the interest of a commercial community like ours to endeavour to control it in too precise and dogmatic a manner, as that would only tend to obstruct private enterprise.

MR. BATES wished to say a few words in reference to a statement of the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) that it was only on board large steamers that a look-out was kept at sea. This statement was by no means correct. He (Mr. Bates) had been round the Cape more than once during the last 40 years both in sailing ships and steamers, and he had never been on board any vessel on which a look-out was not kept at night. No doubt it was true, as stated by the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. T. E. Smith), that the Atlantic steamers crossed generally at full speed; but he would remind the hon. Member that those steamers would bear favourable comparison with other steamers which left our coast.

MR. G. BENTINCK, in reply, said that he had listened attentively to all that had fallen from both sides of the House with reference to the Motion he had brought forward, and he was bound to say that he had heard nothing which answered any statement he had made, nor had he heard any valid reason given for not complying with the suggestion that he had offered. What he had complained of was the driving of steamers at a high rate of speed in thick weather and at night, and in that way causing collisions and loss of life. He could not admit, as the President of the Board of Trade had said, that the question was one not easy of solution. The question could easily be solved if the right hon. Gentleman had the courage and energy to enter upon it. [MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that it was under consideration.] He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would arrive at a different conclusion from that which he had understood him to express that night. Those acquainted with the details of the subject could understand how easy the solution of it would be. He did not propose to alter the 'rules of the road at sea.' All he asked was the making of an additional rule to deal with a particular case. The right hon. Gentleman complained that he had not explained the change which he (Mr. Bentinck) wanted made. It was true he did not state the precise penalties which he would attach, but what he wanted to convey was that at present the penalties were insufficient for the purpose. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to make the penalties sufficient to have a deterrent action upon the wrong-doers, who were drowning people day after day in order to put money into their own pockets, or into those of the owners. He wanted penalties not upon the owners but upon the actual perpetrators of the offence. The owner might be mulcted by the Admiralty Court in the event of a collision, but it was the master whom he wished to reach. Nobody could deny that collisions involving considerable loss annually occurred through the practice of driving steamers at great speed in thick weather, especially in the Channel. The right hon. Gentleman held out the hope that he would introduce a Bill, but it did not seem that that Bill would deal with this particular subject. The question of signals would arise only after the collision had happened, whilst what he (Mr. Bentinck) wanted was to prevent the collision. In not dealing with the precise question he had brought forward, the right hon. Gentleman was assuming a grave responsibility, and he (Mr. Bentinck) must tell him that in so acting he would himself become virtually responsible for the loss of life at sea which was caused by a state of circumstances that might be very easily remedied by him.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he hoped that he might be allowed to explain, as the hon. Gentleman sought to make him personally responsible for loss of life because he had not acceded to his Motion. What he had said was this, that he had no means of judging from the form of the Motion what was meant—what addition it was desired to make to these rules; and this being so, he thought it was unreasonable that he should commit himself off-hand to any pledge as to the extent to which legislation could be carried in this matter. He also said that it should have his best attention, to see if the regulations as to excessive speed could be rendered more effectual.

MR. G. BENTINCK added that he had distinctly stated that what he wanted was more stringent penalties; and if the right hon. Gentleman would say that he would enact the penalties which he (Mr. Bentinck) would point out, he would be perfectly satisfied.

PARKS REGULATION ACT—MEETINGS IN THE PARKS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. J. LOWTHER, in rising to call the attention of the House to the various Rules and Regulations which had been from time to time issued under the provisions of the Parks Regulations Act, 1872; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that rules be drawn up for the more effectual protection of Her Majesty's subjects while availing themselves of the privilege accorded them of using the Royal Parks for purposes of recreation by prohibiting the delivery of public addresses in such Parks."

said, that the subject with which his Notice dealt was one that had occupied a prominent place in the public mind, but had never been fairly discussed. In the early part of the Session there was an irregular discussion introduced somewhat unexpectedly by the Home Secretary upon a limited branch of this subject; but it very soon degenerated into a personal contest, though it was a contest of no ordinary magnitude, and by no means deficient in interest. It was, in fact, a contest of giants. There was the First Commissioner of Works, no mean antagonist for any man, not even for the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), who somehow or other did not now "come up to time," though perhaps at a more fashionable hour he would be there. In introducing the subject, which had been again forced upon the public attention by the events of Sunday week, he did not mean to make it the subject of any Vote of Censure upon the Administration, and still less of an attack upon any individual Minister. As regarded the Minister whose Department was specially charged with the preservation of the privileges accorded to the public in the Royal Parks, he believed that their opinions were not widely apart upon the subject. They were now in a better position than they were formerly for discussing the subject. Formerly there were conflicting opinions upon the state of the law, but now the law had been clearly defined by the highest tribunal in the Realm, and it was no longer competent for anybody to talk of the rights of the people to the Parks, or any of those platitudes that they had previously heard both inside and outside the House. They knew now how far the public authorities might go, and how far licence might go with impunity. Under the provisions of the Act the authorities were empowered to issue special Rules; and saying this brought him to the first set of Rules of the 11th July, 1872. He would not refer to those Rules which dealt with sheep, pigs, cattle, soap, fish, and such things, because he believed that there was no reason on earth for introducing a Bill in order to make regulations upon such subjects. When the Bill was first introduced it did not deal with the monster nuisance, the holding of meetings in the Parks, but the Select Committee introduced that matter into it. The Rules of the 11th July he looked in vain for among his Parliamentary Papers, and he believed that there were only two hon. Members who got them—the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) and the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) who were favoured with "presentation copies." After he had tried in vain to get a copy himself, he remembered that there was "another place," and having gone there he had occasion to join in the popular cry, which was becoming more popular still, of "Thank God, we have a House of Lords." He found that in that House a similar practice as to withholding copies had not prevailed. Although those Rules had been amended and removed from the Table of the House of Lords and were to be considered as withdrawn, he should like to read them, because they were actually issued by those responsible for the government of the Parks. Rule 1 stated that no public address might be delivered except within 20 yards of the boundary stone, marked "Place for Public Addresses;" secondly, that no public address should be delivered on a Sunday—a most salutary regulation and one which would commend itself most heartily, not only to hon. Members, but to the great mass of the community. The next Rule stated that no public address of an unlawful character should be delivered—which was a truism he should have hardly thought it necessary to put the country to the expense of printing. But the most remarkable Rule was that no public address might be delivered unless a written notice to deliver the same, signed with the names and addresses of two householders residing in the metropolis, had been left at the First Commissioner's Office at least two clear days before the intended delivery. Such notice must state the name of the speaker, the subject of the intended address, and the day and hour when it was intended to be delivered. And after such notice had been received no other notice for the purpose of delivering any other address on the same day would be valid. What, he asked, could have been the object for issuing such a regulation as that? Was it done for the mere purpose of vexatiously annoying persons who intended to take part in public demonstrations in the Park, or for the practical object of guarding against serious danger to order and tranquillity and public convenience. It must be patent to those who knew anything of public meetings, that the authors of these Regulations—he presumed the First Commissioner of Works and those who assisted him in the construction of the Rules—must have had at the time a vivid recollection of the discreditable scene that occurred in the Park when the demonstration was made against Lord Robert Grosvenor's Beer Bill, and the Garibaldi meeting when numbers were taken to the hospitals. He presumed that the right hon. Gentleman wished to guard against the repetition of such scenes, and therefore he proposed this Regulation in order that rival meetings for the discussion of controversial topics should not be held at the same time and place; but if the reasons existed on the 11th of July they were equally as cogent now, if they did not exist in a greater degree. The next edition of the Rules appeared on the 26th July, which stated that the Parks might be enjoyed and used in the same manner so far as consistent with statutory regulations as was enjoyed before the passing of the Act. That was not much; but he now came to the edition of the 1st of October, 1872. The first Rule enlarged the area from 20 to 40 yards, and the wonderful notice stone was converted into a board—for the purpose, probably, of economy. Then there was a repetition of the old truism as to the prohibition of unlawful addresses, without any definition of what was unlawful; and next followed a Rule as to the giving of two clear days' notice to the First Commissioner, signed by two householders, the same as he had read, with this exception, that it did not require the subject of addresses or the names of the speakers to be stated. He purposely avoided going into the circumstances attending the withdrawal of those sets of Rules and the motives for the framing of fresh ones. The dates spoke for themselves. Until the 10th of February last the last named Rules remained in force, and on that day the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, to the intense astonishment of the House—and he thought of the right hon. Gentleman himself when the further revised Rules were placed in his hands—proposed a fourth edition of the Park Regulations. That addition practically placed the entire Park at the disposal of those who formed those demonstrations. Certain bounds were placed within which the addresses must be delivered, and in this Regulation a very useful edifice, the powder-magazine, played an important and significant part. But what were those bounds? Why, the entire Park was practically handed over to the roughs who collected together upon these occasions, with the solitary exception of one spot—which, by the way, was the portion of the Park in the centre of which the great bulk of the community would be most anxious to see the promoters of these troublesome assemblages immersed—namely, the Serpentine. However, as he had seen signs of works going on in the neighbourhood, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner contemplated erecting a platform there to enable the speakers the better to address their admirers. He confessed that for his part he had not the slightest objection to public meetings. He had taken part at many meetings at which resolutions, which he had moved or supported, denouncing the Executive Government pretty freely had been adopted, and he hoped to live to do so again more than once, and the right which he claimed for himself in that respect he did not grudge to his fellow-men. But while he did not wish to prevent those persons at proper times and places airing their eloquence so long as they kept within the bounds of law and public decency, he desired to see others protected in the enjoyment of their privileges. What was the nature of those gatherings, of what elements were they composed, and who were the persons interested in the demonstrations being kept within reasonable limits? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) was very fond of talking of carriage company and of the fashionable classes as if the upper ten thousand were specially interested in the limiting of the demonstrations. They were not. It was well known to hon. Members that on Sundays—the day usually selected for the meetings—the Park was not the haunt of what were called the upper classes. It was notorious that at any rate by the Gentile portion—he did not mean the genteel, though the term might be applicable—of the fashionable world the Park was not frequented to any extent upon Sundays; he might say that it was used almost exclusively on that day by the artizan, who had worked during the other days of the week, and by his wife and children. He hoped, therefore, they would not have a repetition of the fallacy that it was the selfishness of the upper classes, who wished to keep the Park to themselves. But what was the nature of these gatherings? Were they in reality what were known as public meetings? They had been told that their forefathers had contended for the right of public meeting. But what resemblance was there between the meetings in question and those for which their forefathers had contended? None whatever. They were far more like those specimens of rowdiness which were so great a curse and discredit to the other side of the Atlantic. They were mere displays of physical force in order to tyrannize rather than for calm discussion and argument. Those who had witnessed them would bear him out when he said that discussion was the furthest thing from their ideas; the speeches could rarely be heard except by a few, and the elements of which the gatherings were composed had no connection truly with the working man. They had only to glance at the names of those who took part in them to find that the élites of the working classes were absent. So far from their attending them they found in the chair some dismissed Revising Barrister, or some embryo County Court Judge, or perhaps for a little change they would find an ex-colonel, and on some occasions the ex-treasurer of a mess fund. Sometimes they were persons who might pass for workmen, but who no more represented that class than gingerbread without ginger—working men who never worked, glass-blowers who never blew a bottle, or cobblers who never mended a shoe, yet who pretended to represent the working men on these occasions in the eyes of the British public. Perhaps it was some person who was engaged in a ribald travesty of a Court of Justice, and who had been rewarded for his act of wanton violence in breaking into the Home Office by a grateful reception from a distinguished leader of a great political party. With these exceptions he could find no one who could bonâ fide claim to be a working man taking part in these gatherings. At these meetings they also found that what were called mock litanies were very much in vogue. He would not insult the sense of the House by reading the details of these performances, but many persons were drawn to them from the spot where the stalest sedition was being spouted from the so-called chair; and these songs and tracts, which, with strange and perverse ingenuity, contrived to be at once disloyal, blasphemous, and obscene, found nevertheless a ready sale. He wished the House to reflect upon the contempt for authority engendered by these scenes. They found a person, he was going to say rewarded, who was connected with the discreditable scenes of 1866, when the Park railings were pulled down. That individual was, however, it was only fair to add, speedily brought into a Court of Justice by the present Government; but to the astonishment of the public, he was placed not in the dock, but on the bench. He did not say this with a view of casting a stone at the learned gentleman, but as a reflection upon those who had placed him in that position. As to the learned gentleman himself, he never mentioned his name without feeling the deepest gratitude to him, because it was to him they were indebted for the greatest metropolitan improvement of modern times—the widening of Park Lane and for the new palings. There were circumstances attending the last demonstration in Hyde Park on Sunday week which he specially desired to bring under the notice of the House. That was not a hole-and-corner affair got up in one of the “pot-houses” referred to by the Chief Commissioner, without notice and by obscure persons, but was resolved upon at a densely crowded meeting of delegates somewhere at Bow, at which it was agreed that “in the interests of order and decorum,” notice of the intended procession should be sent to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as Chief Ranger of Hyde Park, and to the Chief Commissioner of Works. The drift of their communication was a request that the gardeners and Park keepers should be directed to prevent boys from climbing the trees, and injuring the plants and shrubs, because “in a large concourse of persons (they added) there would always be unruly persons whose acts brought discredit”—not upon the public but—"upon the meeting." This statement on the part of the promoters of the demonstrations was a confession that they had the effect of collecting a crowd of persons whose mischievous tendencies they too shrewdly suspected. The account wound up with the remarkable resolution—"That the procession should not be broken on its route, except by a funeral or a fire engine." Never in the course of his life had he heard of anything approaching such a point of audacity as this, that the persons promoting these meetings in Hyde Park arrogated to themselves the right of stopping the traffic of the metropolis for at least 25 minutes—the time which it took the procession to pass a given point, according to his own observation. They not only undertook to stop the traffic, but the police were charged with carrying their imperial behests into effect. Did the authorities meet such notices by telling these persons that they would endeavour to protect them as long as they conformed to the law of the country? Far from it. He went to the rendezvous in Trafalgar Square, whence the procession started. He saw them again in another part of the route, and lastly in the Park, and he felt bound to say in the whole of St. James's Street the most minute observation on his own part, and on that of friends who were with him, failed to detect a single guardian of the peace, and for 25 minutes one of the main arteries of the metropolis was handed over to the tender mercies of a body of roughs. There were the usual bands and banners and emblems, more or less seditious, in the procession; but the House would hardly believe him when he said that at different stages of the route persons stepped forward to turn away the cabs and private carriages, and prevent them from breaking the line of the procession. He watched one person in a cab with a portmanteau upon it who was kept waiting for 15 minutes, while his train was probably gliding away from the station. He was informed on reliable authority that a noble Lord who occupied a high position in the Councils of the Sovereign, and who at that very moment was designed by public rumour for a position still higher, was stopped by this procession. His noble Friend the Member for Marlborough (Lord Ernest Bruce) was, he had heard, also stopped. One of the Park Rules said that there must be no unauthorized playing of any music in the Parks. If an organ-grinder had attempted to play the "Old Hundredth" he would soon have been taken to prison. There were bands however—one playing the "Marseillaise" and another the "Wearing of the Green"—under the protection of the guardians of public order. The Park was a perfect fair. There were people selling oranges, buns, cocoa-nuts, and other nuts, with the usual cry of "Crack 'em and try 'em before you buy 'em." At one time he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, finding his engagements too numerous to enable him to visit his constituents, was reduced to the extremity of reviving the old Conservative institution of Greenwich fair, and had invited them into the Park. The Park Regulations said that "no person should sell or let any commodity." Now, if the Chief Commissioner had been there—[Mr. AYRTON: I was there]. If so, why did not the right hon. Gentleman see that his Rules were enforced? Perhaps he was of opinion that it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman on his right (the Home Secretary) to enforce these Rules. He should like to hear from the Home Secretary whether he had communicated to the Chief Commissioner of Police that the Rules of the Park were to be duly and efficiently carried out. The police were fully justified in not carrying out the ordinary Rules of the Park, because the feelings of common humanity would have been outraged at the spectacle of two full-grown constables dragging an orange girl to gaol, while the most flagrant violation, not only of the Rules of the Park, but of common decency and decorum, was elsewhere permitted. The litany men were present, but perhaps thinking some respect was due to the season of Lent, they did not appear in canonicals. A journal called The Republican was on sale, directed against "Kings, Queens, Princes, Priests, and Policemen," and the scene he then witnessed led him to think now of less-favoured regions—say Sloane Square. We lived in a Happy Land, in which any amount of blasphemy, sedition, and obscenity was not only pardoned, but promoted and encouraged by the authorities—"No, no!"—because it was carried on under the eyes of the police without their moving a finger to stop it—provided no sentence was interpolated which would provoke a smile at the expense of any Minister of the Crown. He believed the Rules, especially those issued by the Government on July 11, were framed to meet a danger known to exist—namely, that rival meetings might be got up on the same day, that sentiments inimical to those expressed by the promoters might be denounced by others, and that a row might ensue. But had those dangers ceased to exist? Was there no danger of an Orange demonstration, which might, perhaps, end very much as did certain gatherings at Reading and Windsor, where certain fundamental and organic changes in the constitution of this country were openly handled? No, those dangers had not ceased. The English people, though law-abiding to a degree, were not disposed to brook these insults against institutions under which the country had so long prospered; and, in the absence of other protectors of decency, they had not abandoned their right of appeal to a Judge whose mandamus could override even that of a County Court Judge—he meant Judge Lynch. He had no wish to advocate a resort to the arbitrament of this personage, but the danger was not one to be lost sight of. In many parts of the country People's Parks had been given by philanthropic gentlemen like the late Sir Francis Crossley, and his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesborough (Mr. Bolckow), and rules had been framed under the direction of those benefactors, and with the full consent of the people for whose interest they were prepared, specially prohibiting all political and other meetings there. He was only asking the House to frame in the case of the Royal Parks the same regulations as had been adopted in almost every provincial Park under public control. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Lowther), said, the last Sunday demonstration in Hyde Park seemed to have been—he presumed by the authority of the right hon. Gentleman—placed under the special protection of the police; for a Mr. Mooney stated that, on the part of the people who were to take part in it, he had had an interview with Colonel Henderson, who received him most kindly, and promised that the police would protect the procession in its progress through London. He was glad the subject had been brought before the House. The supporters of this Motion were speaking, not against the liberties of the people, but for the liberties of the people; they were speaking against the tyranny of a set of roughs, and against the tyranny of mobs, which was of all tyrannies the worst. He himself saw carriages detained at Hyde Park Corner for 25 minutes while these roughs, accompanied by women of the lowest class, and displaying flags and banners, were allowed to pass by. The working men of London had little to do with such demonstrations; it was the roughs of London who chose to collect together and block the streets of London in this way on a Sunday. He had an important document to read to the House in support of his hon. Friend's description of the people who went with these processions. It referred to the Amnesty Meeting of November, 1872, but he was assured that the handbill announcing the last meeting was exactly similar. The handbill said—

"To the Working Classes of London—Monster Amnesty Meeting in Hyde Park on Sunday, November 3, 1872.—A grand demonstration, similar to that which took place in October, 1869, will be held in Hyde Park, to demand the unconditional release of the Fenian prisoners, and to protest against their infamous treatment and the Algerine acts now in force in Ireland. Trusted representatives of the Proletarians, of all countries" (this was the International Society) "will take part in the proceedings. The people will meet in their respective districts, and under the direction of local committees proceed in military order four deep towards Trafalgar Square, which will be the central point of rendezvous for the entire procession. The International sections, Republican clubs, trades and other associations, will assemble in places appointed by their officers, from whence they will proceed to Trafalgar Square. Proletarians of all countries—Mr. Gladstone, the Bomba of Ireland, has again refused to release the 42 Irish political prisoners from the gaols of England, in which they are subjected to the most cruel treatment. Assemble in your tens of thousands to demand their release in the name of outraged humanity. English working men, arise from your apathy, and show the world that you sympathize with your Irish brothers, and that they are detained in cruel confinement against your will. Speak out boldly now, and at the next elections kick out the brutal gaolers who misrepresent you in the British House of Commons."

That document almost seemed a burlesque. It seemed as if the whole of this procession was intended as a joke. But it was not intended as a joke, and when a procession was summoned by that kind of language, and passed through the streets of London on a Sunday under the protection of the police, he did not hesitate to say that it was a disgrace to the civilization of this City, and, he must add, it was almost a disgrace to the House of Commons and to the Government that such a thing should be permitted. He knew that it was not the working men but the roughs of London who collected on these occasions and blocked the streets, and he regretted that the capital of England should be disgraced by such exhibitions. In conclusion he wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether it was true that, at an interview with the Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, Colonel Henderson really promised that the police should protect this procession.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that rules be drawn up for the more effectual protection of Her Majesty's subjects while availing themselves of the privilege accorded them of using the Royal Parks for purposes of recreation by prohibiting the delivery of public addresses in such parks."—(Mr. James Lowther.)

MR. AUBERON HERBERT, in rising to move as an Amendment—

"That this House approves of the Rules lately issued by Her Majesty's Government for the Regulation of the Royal Parks, and is of opinion that no alteration affecting the existing rights of public meeting therein should be made unless previously approved by Parliament."

said he believed it was an object of hon. Members who sat below the gangway on both sides of the House to watch over the consistency, the straightforwardness, and the many other virtues of the right hon. Gentlemen who sat above them, and his hon. Friend (Mr. Lowther) opposite hoped by his Motion to commit some right hon. Gentlemen who he observed had taken great care not to be there that night to some plain statements which he had submitted. However much he admired the straightforwardness and plainness of speech of his hon. Friend, he could not but feel that the advice he had offered was rash and extreme. It was advice which ought not to be followed, and which was besides impracticable.

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

The object which he (Mr. A. Herbert) had in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice was much humbler than that of his hon. Friend. He only wished to put temptation out of the reach of hon. Gentlemen on whichever side they sat. He did not think this was a matter to which they could look back with satisfaction on either side of the House. But a satisfactory solution of the difficulties had been arrived at. He would not criticize the conduct of the Government in this matter, because they were sinners who had repented. The Government were now acting on sound principles, and he would venture to say to them in the words of the proverb, that "Catch Hold was a good dog, but Keep Hold was a better," and to hope that they would persevere in the path on which they had entered. There were a great many different kinds of recreation, especially in the Parks, with none of which they desired to interfere. And why should the hon. Members opposite desire to interfere? Some people found recreation in walking, some in riding, some in sitting on chairs—for the use of which they paid 2d.—and smoking cigars, some in riding thoroughbred hacks. There was another class who found recreation in being drawn in carriages in an endless circle, and who reminded one of unhappy spirits in a region described by Dante. He did not quarrel with these kinds of recreation, but if it was a recreation to some of the public to meet in a Park on any day to express their opinions on public affairs and criticize what had passed, why should they not have the same freedom of enjoying their recreation as was accorded to the other classes he had mentioned? The real grievance of his hon. Friend was that these meetings slightly delayed the carriages of noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen. The only people that seemed to find favour with his hon. Friend were the orange women. He was kind enough to say he did not complain of them. But if a man attempted to sell a penny paper in one of the Parks, in the opinion of his hon. Friend, he ought to be dealt with by the Metropolitan Police. His hon. Friend said he watched for 25 minutes the meeting that was held a few days ago in Hyde Park, and there was not one policeman to be seen. Was not that testimony to the good conduct of the meeting? The truth was that since the Government had allowed these meetings to be held a great change of temper had occurred, and those who convened these meetings took every step in their power to make them thoroughly orderly and respectable. His hon. Friend had talked about crowds in New York. He (Mr. A. Herbert) had seen meetings in the squares of New York comprising many thousands of people, all of whom had conducted themselves in a perfectly peaceable and orderly manner. What was the reason of that? Simply because the Government was wise enough not to attempt to offer the slightest opposition to those meetings. He believed we had learnt one thing, namely, that the greatest safety lay in a perfectly free and open discussion of everything. He knew there were the elements of danger and revolution in this country as in every other country. Through the neglect and unjust character of much of our past legislation some bad temper had been excited among a portion of the people of this country, but he frankly owned that he did not sympathize with that temper. If it were desired to give the dangers that now existed an explosive force which at present they did not possess, it was only necessary to attempt to restrain and restrict the right of open and free discussion. In this country we, doubtless, had to contend with some disadvantages, but we had not to contend against secret societies. Whatever was felt came freely to the surface and was openly expressed, and thus our safety was ensured. Should the time ever arrive, as he believed it might, when we in this country might make grievous mistakes in the way of rash experiments, our only safety would lie in our perfect freedom of discussion, which would enable us to recover ourselves and to rectify our mistake without vital injury to the nation. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. RYLANDS, in seconding the Amendment, said, he felt bound to defend the action of the Government, who, however they might have erred originally in the matter, had at length fully repented of their error, and had done their best to rectify it. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Lowther) had referred to the clauses which authorized the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works to frame Rules for the government of the Parks, but he had not stated how it was that that clause came to be inserted in the Bill. The hon. Member who doubtless possessed great ability ["Hear, hear!"], great ability for mischief, had himself proposed the insertion of that clause in the Bill, when it was under the consideration of the Select Committee some two years ago, and he succeeded in carrying his proposal, by a majority of 1, in the absence of two hon. Members who supported the views of the Government on the Committee. But when the Bill came back to that House thus amended, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Board of Works declined the responsibility of the measure. He (Mr. Rylands) had complained on a former occasion that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had for some unknown reason introduced that clause into his Bill in 1872, although he had withdrawn the measure he had brought forward in 1871, because a Motion for inserting a similar clause into it had been carried. Fortunately, however, Her Majesty's Government, after making one or two false moves in connection with this subject, had framed Rules under that clause for the government of the Parks, which were perfectly unobjectionable. The hon. Member for York was dissatisfied, because Her Majesty's Government had shown a disposition to make a concession to public opinion, and in favour of public rights, and acting no doubt consistently with the opinions he entertained on the subject in 1871, now asked the House to agree to an address to Her Majesty praying that she would prevent public addresses being delivered in the Parks, which would effect the same object which he had sought for by his Amendment in the previous Bill. But where were now those right hon. Gentlemen who had in 1871 supported the views of the hon. Member for York? Circumstances had since then greatly changed. That the hon. Member would not obtain universal support on this question from even his own side of the House was evident by the state of the Opposition front benches. The unoccupied condition of those benches was an eloquent expression of opinion on the part of the hon. Member's political leader. ["No, no!"] The hon. Member might dispute the fact as much as he liked, but there could be no doubt that the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire was his political leader. The reason why those benches were so deserted on this occasion was because the time had arrived when the Conservative leaders felt themselves on the threshold of office. Did the hon. Member for York think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) were he again Home Secretary would support his proposition and attempt to prevent public meetings being held in the Parks? Did he imagine that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy), if again in office, would countenance such a measure as the hon. Gentleman now advocated? He admitted that on the fringe of great public assemblies something improper and objectionable might occur, and he fully endorsed the opinion of the hon. Member that the mock litanies which were performed on such occasions were most disgraceful. That fact, however, furnished no reason why the people should be prohibited from expressing their opinions in the Royal Parks or other public places. By adopting the advice of the hon. Member for York on this subject they would take a course like that of a man who sat upon the safety valve whilst the steam was rising in the boiler, and thus occasioned an explosion which spread death and destruction around. It was true that munificent gentlemen who gave parks to towns in the country usually made it a condition that political meetings should not be held in them; but the Royal Parks occupied a different position altogether, inasmuch as they were not the gifts of any individuals—they were the property of the people. ["No, no!"] He said "Yes." The people had bought them over and over again, and had given for them a great deal more than they were worth. The property belonged to the people, and it had been paid for out of the public taxation. The grants made by Parliament to the Crown in successive reigns amounted to more than the value of the Parks, and though, no doubt, they might produce a large sum if cut up for building purposes, those grants were made in times gone by, when no such sum could have been realized. The hon. Member for York might have refrained from any allusion to a learned gentleman whose name was associated with this question. He would only say that that learned gentleman's conduct in the assertion of a public right was no disqualification for the position to which the Government had appointed him, and which his professional standing entitled him to fill.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House approves of the Rules lately issued by Her Majesty's Government for the Regulation of the Royal Parks, and is of opinion that no alteration affecting the existing rights of public meeting therein should be made unless previously approved by Parliament," — (Mr. Auberon Herbert.)

—instead thereof.

Mr. STRAIGHT said, he could not quite agree with the hon. Member for York (Mr. Lowther), because he should be the last to put a stop to fair and free public discussion on public matters; but, at the same time, he contended that there was a middle course between unduly checking free discussion, and an indiscriminate permission to hold gatherings which were a nuisance to the general public. He believed the Prime Minister was out of town on the Sunday which had been referred to. Had he seen the gathering permitted to form a procession, he would have felt that such proceedings ought not to be countenanced. Long processions in the public thoroughfares were not essential to public meetings, but were clearly a nuisance. He could not help recollecting a discussion which took place in 1871 when the subject was the Phoenix Park Riots, and a Motion was brought forward by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), which censured the Government for dispersing a meeting in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, respecting the release of the Fenian prisoners, a subject which the Prime Minister then declared to be one on which such a gathering could not be permitted. It was strange, therefore, that a public discussion of the same subject should be allowed in Hyde Park. The Executive Government should have the discretionary power of confining these meetings within reasonable limits, for the licence advocated by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. A. Herbert) might lead to the public discussion of questionable subjects prejudicial to the morals of nursemaids and the Life Guards accompanying them. Hon. Members who did not reside in London ought to have a little consideration in that matter for those who were compelled to do so, and who were subjected to the great inconvenience and annoyance caused by those processions. The hon. Member for York had referred to the fact that a Cabinet Minister was stopped on his way through the streets by the mob and delayed on a Sunday; but with the extreme gallantry which belonged to him that right hon. Gentleman cut his way through the advancing hosts, and found himself on the other side of Piccadilly. Without wishing any harm to any right hon. Gentleman, he feared that until some catastrophe happened to a Cabinet Minister through these processions in these great thoroughfares, the public would obtain no relief from so serious a nuisance.

MR. AYRTON said, that the propositions had been brought under the consideration of the House at some length by two hon. Gentlemen who, after the very prolonged discussions on the Royal Parks Bill last Session, both found themselves under the painful necessity of expressing their objection to the passing of that measure when all the rest of the House were satisfied that it ought to become law. How was it that those hon. Gentlemen were so restless? He believed it arose from the fact that they entertained most extreme opinions. The hon. Member for York (Mr. Lowther) was extremely Conservative, and yet he objected that under his own provision it was possible for any body of the people to express their opinions in any of the Royal Parks; while the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Herbert) was equally dissatisfied because it might be impossible for some of the people to express their opinions in the development of Republican principles, which he thought ought to be advanced by peaceful means and not by violence. That was a question which the House by its unanimity last year showed ought to be approached with reason and moderation; and it was rather remarkable that the hon. Gentlemen who had been most eminent in that House in discussing that subject had never had imposed on them by their constituents the duty of watching over the interests of the metropolis. He thought the Members for the Metropolis were always quite competent and sufficiently active to bring forward any grievance under which their constituents laboured; yet, strange to say, the voice of none of those hon. Gentlemen had been raised in complaint against the manner in which the Parks Act had been carried out. The discussions which had arisen appeared to proceed from the excessive spirit of contention by which some hon. Gentlemen were animated in favour of their own peculiar views. He was surprised to find so distinguished a Conservative as the hon. Member for York objecting to the holding of public meetings in London. Did the hon. Member forget that processions and gatherings of the people were among the most ancient and most Conservative institutions in the world, and were universal in England until they were superseded by the modern invention of printing, which enabled people to communicate their ideas by other means; and the practice of holding popular gatherings was falling into disuse, in proportion as printing, writing, and reading increased. Therefore instead of coming there to object, the hon. Member ought rather to have come to complain that an ancient institution was decaying away. Now, representations had been made to him that there were occasions when people in the metropolis desired to meet for discussion at less expense than if they had to hire halls for the purpose; therefore he had undertaken to make such arrangements as would give them as much facility for expressing their opinions to the assemblies which they wished to convene in the Park as they would have enjoyed if they met in a hall. The first set of Park Rules was made in fulfilment of that pledge. It would have been a breach of faith towards the House and towards those who had made those representations if the Rules had not been as precise as they were, in order not only to confer that particular privilege, but to secure its enjoyment without interruption. It turned out, however, that the first set of Rules did not satisfy everybody, and that some people were determined to assert a right to set at defiance any Rules or restrictions which might be laid down. When that line was adopted there was but one course to pursue in regard to it—namely, to assert the rights of the Crown and the authority of Parliament by prosecuting those who so acted. The prosecution showed that those parties were entirely in the wrong. The Rules had all been framed for the same purpose—namely, to regulate the enjoyment of the Parks so far as to prevent abuse. The last Rules like the first provided that persons going into the Parks to deliver addresses should not destroy the general enjoyment of the Parks. They also provided that the delivery of the addresses should be subordinate to the authorities and to all those rights which were reserved to Her Majesty; and if they were rather less precise than those that went before they still left the question as a whole very much as it stood under the first arrangement, and the matter might now very well have been allowed to rest. He had been asked by the hon. Member who seconded the motion (Mr. B. Cochrane) whether he had sent for the Chief Commissioner of Police, and directed him to allow the meeting held a few days ago to be carried on without interruption. That question arose from a misapprehension of the First Commissioner's duty. The general use of the Park was entirely under the control of the Ranger, and the police were placed in the Park to uphold the Ranger's authority in the discharge of his duty. The First Commissioner of Works had no power to send for the Chief Commissioner of Police or to give him any directions in regard to any meeting held in the Park. He hoped the hon. Member for York (Mr. Lowther) would see that under the circumstances it was inopportune to press his Resolution on the notice of the House. If that motion was inopportune the Amendment of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Herbert) was one which could not be entertained. It stated that no alteration affecting the "existing rights" of public meeting therein should be made unless previously approved by Parliament. Now there were no "existing rights," and it would be impossible to agree to these words. A misapprehension existed that the Crown had given up its rights. Now the Crown had never surrendered its rights to the public. What the Sovereign did on Her accession to the Throne was to surrender the property of the Crown lands as part of the public revenue, but the Parks, not being kept for the purposes of profit, were not at all surrendered, and remained in the Sovereign precisely in the same way as Her Palaces. It would, therefore, be quite wrong to pass a Resolution in the terms proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham. He hoped, therefore, he would be satisfied with having used it as a text for promulgating his views on the subject, and that he and the hon. Member for York would pair their opinions one against the other.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had listened with some curiosity to the speeches which had been made to see whether any answer would be given to the statements of his hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Lowther), but, not having heard any, he must again call the attention of the House to the main points which he had raised. Though he was prepared to vote for the Motion of his hon. Friend, he was afraid it would not be carried, for the occupants of the two front benches were both tarred in this matter with the same brush. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) who addressed the House very frequently and with great ability, seemed to be so much engrossed with his own speeches that he had not time to attend to the facts of the case, otherwise he would have a more accurate knowledge of what had actually occurred. At the time when the Rules were framed there were two courses open to the Government, either to throw open the Parks to the lawless individuals who were patronized by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Warrington and by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Herbert), or to pass the Parks Bill and to frame regulations in accordance with the measure. The latter was the course which they took, but owing to their vacillation, they had brought the law into the utmost discredit. They had passed he did not know how many sets of Rules within the last three months for the purpose of regulating the meetings in the Parks, but he could not believe it possible that there could have been, notwithstanding, any such systematic violation of the law as had occurred on the 3rd of November. The police were, in the first place, entirely withdrawn from the Parks, and the speakers at the meeting—who, as usual, played but a small part in the proceedings, were stationed beyond the legal distance from the post which had been set up by the Chief Commissioner. A body composed of at least 50 or 60 persons ascended the trees, and he himself saw at least one branch of a tree broken off in the most deliberate manner, which must have measured 25 feet. [An hon. MEMBER: The "Upas tree."] That was not all gone; there was one branch standing yet. There were, besides, persons offering for sale scurrilous verses on Her Majesty, a blasphemous litany, and other articles acceptable to a mob; and why had not such a state of things been put a stop to by the Secretary of State for the Home Department? Did the right hon. Gentleman think such exhibitions as those were proper on a Sunday afternoon? He happened on the evening of the day in question to meet a London stipendiary magistrate of great experience, to whom he had put the question whether, if he were to walk down Rotten Row on any afternoon in the week, and to offer for sale sticks or gingerbread nuts, he would do anything to him if he were brought before him? The answer was that he would be sent to prison for a month. Yet a Liberal Government allowed men to talk sedition and treason in the Park on Sunday afternoon with impunity. But that was not all: the trees having been broken down, the wood was openly stolen and taken out of the Park. He saw a policeman standing at Albert Gate when a person was coming out with an armful of sticks, and when he asked him why he did not interfere, the policeman merely shrugged his shoulders, saying that he had orders not to meddle in the matter. Where he should like to know was the justice of permitting treason to be rampant when offences much less heinous were punished by having the names of those who committed them placarded? He did not see the meeting in the Park last Sunday week, but he had heard that what had occurred there was but a repetition of the scene of the 1st of November, and he should like to ask the hon. Member for Nottingham, who said an act of violence had been committed, what he thought of the destruction of national property and the licence carrying of hackney carriages? But he left the Park. At there was the Metropolitan Police Act which rendered it a punishable offence to threaten the sale or sell or exhibit indecent or wanton publications, or to destroy trees. The provisions of that Act had therefore been broken with impunity. Why, he asked, had they not been enforced? The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works said he was not responsible. It was quite true that he did not control the police, nor did the Ranger of the Park, but the Home Secretary was answerable for the offences that had been committed, and to him the public had a right to look to see that the law was enforced and breaches of the law punished. Why was it, he asked, that while the leaders of these demonstrations were allowed to set the law at defiance, lesser offenders, who were not guilty of sedition, were apprehended and punished? He ventured to say that the great majority of the ratepayers were opposed to such demonstrations. The Government had talked a great deal about a policy of equality, but if they meant anything by that, why did they allow Mr. Odger and others to break the law? Ruffianism was tolerated, while respectability was oppressed. The fact was, what in the ruffian was a choleric word, that in the respectable was rank blasphemy. An hon. Member opposite had proposed to stop the delivery of letters on a Sunday, but did he not think that he might effect some good by helping to stop displays of this kind on that day? He hoped Her Majesty's Government would not only be able to offer a satisfactory explanation to the House for their apishness, but also to give some guarantee to the inhabitants of the metropolis that the law—so far as they could secure it—would be observed in the future.

Mr. BRUCE said, he rose with pleasure to answer the question of his hon. Friend Mr. Bantock, and in doing so, would endeavor to keep separate issues which had agitated his hon. Friend and others been treated as one. The first was, whether the Parks should be used for public meetings and the next question, if so, they should be used in a decent, orderly manner in accordance with the law. The first point he must assume to argue, assuming—and he thought the House would agree with him—that it had been already settled in the long discussion on the Parks Bill and Amendment Bill with respect to the second issue, his hon. Friend had raised a very fair question, and was entitled to an answer. His hon. Friend complained that certain disorder had occurred in the Parks which had not been punished, and that, in the case of obstructions in the streets, the Police Acts had not been enforced. With respect to what happened in November last, his hon. Friend had forgotten to inform the House that no fewer than 12 persons had been summoned—[Mr. BENTINCK: For addresses]—before the magistrates for violation of the law. He was not there to defend any such violation of the law, or any address delivered, or act committed contrary to law, and he quite agreed with his hon. Friend that if the police had witnessed the destruction of trees, it was their duty to have taken the offender into custody. There had been a breach of the law by the delivery of addresses contrary to the Rules, and with that offence the parties committing it were charged. Subsequently, other meetings were held, and applications were made to the magistrates to issue summonses, but they declined, on the ground that it was not their practice to do so when a case had been granted which raised the question whether the proceedings were or were not legal. In fact, the legality of the Rules was the question to be decided under the case which was submitted for the decision of the Superior Court. With respect to what happened on last Sunday week, he had listened attentively to the statement of his hon. Friend (Mr. Lowther) who had moved the Resolution with so much ability; but he found that the whole of his speech was taken up with what had occurred as to the obstruction of the streets. His hon. Friend had mentioned one act of violence—namely, an assault on the soldier who had been so seriously injured. It was his (Mr. Bruce's) duty to inquire into that case, and he had done so. He sent an inspector of police to visit the poor man, and he assured the inspector that what had happened was entirely by accident—that he was in a great hurry to get away, but had not been pushed, struck, or assaulted. He was bound to say that the reports he had read in all the newspapers confirmed the reports from other sources, and bore testimony to the order and good conduct of the persons attending the meeting. They consisted of a number of Irishmen celebrating by anticipation their national festival, and discharging at the same time what they considered to be a duty of patriotism.

He did not agree with them, but he was bound to say he had heard of no instance of violence or of improper conduct on the part of those men, or of injury to the trees of the Park. With respect to the obstruction in the streets, it was impossible that meetings could be held in the Parks without a procession being formed in the streets. When large numbers of persons converged towards the Park some obstruction must necessarily be caused, and a certain amount of latitude should be allowed. Undoubtedly, it was the duty of the police to see that that obstruction was reduced to a minimum, and that free transit was allowed to all persons in pursuing their ordinary business. His hon. Friend would remember that a Question was put to him by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) with respect to the instructions he had given to the Chief Commissioner of Police, and he replied to the effect he had just mentioned. The principal promoter of the meeting called on the Chief Commissioner of Police to make inquiry on the subject, and he had no doubt the Chief Commissioner informed him he had given instructions to take on that occasion, as on all others, all necessary measures for the preservation of order. There would, he thought, be no disagreement on either side of the House as to that part of the question. His hon. Friend opposite the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck) had stated cases of offence against the law which he had seen committed. If they were committed in the presence of the police, it was a very gross breach of duty on their part not to have acted strenuously and promptly. He only wished his hon. Friend had communicated with him, and he should at once have endeavoured, not only to punish the offenders, but also those who had allowed the offence to be committed without arresting the guilty persons. It was not his intention to enter into the question of the general policy of the Rules. With respect to that, he was well content to rest his position on the arguments of his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works. He rose simply to answer the challenge of his hon. Friend opposite, and he hoped he had done so satisfactorily.

Mr. OTWAY said, that after they had arrived at a satisfactory settlement of this irritating question, it was a matter of regret that it should have again been raised. He rose to enter his protest against the impression which the First Commissioner of Works had endeavoured to convey, that the Parks Bill of last year had been passed with unanimity. On the contrary, he and his hon. Friends near him had protested night after night against the mischievous, irritating, and foolish legislation which the First Commissioner had introduced. He told the right hon. Gentleman that some of the Regulations he proposed were mischievous and absurd; that they must inevitably be defeated; and the right hon. Gentleman, receiving his remarks with the urbanity and courtesy which distinguished him, replied that these were just the Regulations which he thought most necessary. They only allowed the Bill to pass on the promise of the right hon. Gentleman that the use of the Parks by the public was to continue as heretofore; but no sooner did the Bill become law than it was found, as he and others predicted, that these annoying and useless Regulations could not possibly be maintained; and these Regulations, which one would have supposed could only have emanated from King Theodore, of Abyssinia, had now been prudently withdrawn by the Government. He regretted that so irritating a subject should now be revived, and wondered that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lowther) should seek to identify his party with what appeared to be restrictions upon popular rights. He reminded the hon. Member that the most Conservative leader of the Conservative party, the late Lord Derby, was of opinion that some place of public resort in the metropolis should be given to the people for out-door meetings. Working men had not the means of acquiring music-halls or other places in-doors, and even if they had it was desirable, always providing that order was maintained, that they should be able to meet in open spaces. In his opinion Hyde Park was not the best place for holding public meetings; but, at the same time, having witnessed many demonstrations there, he was bound to say he had never seen any inconvenience arising from them. The meetings were held in a part of the Park which was not frequented by fashionable people. It seemed to him most unwise to raise that question again, and, under all the circumstances, he trusted that the hon. Gentleman would not press the Motion to a division.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he would support the Resolution as a protest against the favourite doctrine of the present day, that the noisy portion of the community represented the people. He believed that the mass of English people, strictly so called, were a most eminently order-loving and law-abiding people, and that they entirely objected to the use of the Parks which was now so much in vogue. The Home Secretary said that they had now made certain Rules, and that they might trust to the good sense of the people. The answer to that was that they knew those Rules by their fruits. They saw what those Rules had produced, and they were not satisfied with the result. This was not a question of the fashionable part of the community against the poorer portion. He believed that if the people who availed themselves of the public Parks on Sundays were asked their opinion, they would say that the public demonstrations interfered with the peaceable and orderly enjoyment of the Parks. A letter describing one of these meetings in November had been sent to the newspapers by a Liberal M.P. [An Hon. MEMBER: It was anonymous.] It might be true and yet anonymous; and if it were not true, let the hon. Member who wrote it rise and say so. The writer said that there were the same disgraceful proceedings, the same blasphemous litanies, and the same obscene rubbish that had marked previous meeting. The letter went on to say that the most shocking things were said of the Queen, and further, that litanies of the most blasphemous and obscene character were read and sold. Now, whatever might be the sentiments of hon. Members of this House on matters of religion, he was sure they would one and all, repudiate the travestying, blaspheming, or ridiculing, of any of the sacred doctrines of Christianity. He went one step further, and said that if religion was to be dealt with in the Parks, at all events there ought to be fair play. If anyone unwisely tried to preach upon religious subjects to a miscellaneous audience in the Parks, he would soon be put down by authority; but those persons, who travestied religion, blasphemed its doctrines, mocked its ceremonies, and insulted its professors, were allowed to pursue their calling unchecked. Such a state of things was not only unworthy of a Christian nation, but it was repugnant to common justice, and if the House could not put an end to the inconsistency in the name of common Christianity, let it condemn it in the name of common justice.

MR. TIPPING said, he wished to point out that the meetings held in the Parks were utterly un-English and were merely an imitation of those French meetings which were always held prior to revolutionary attempts. As their only object was to overawe, alarm, intimidate, and annoy, no legitimate excuse could be set up for them, and to put them down altogether would be no real interference with free speech or the right of public meeting. Whenever a demonstration of this kind occurred in the Park, it must necessarily interfere with the pleasure of those who usually walked there, and although the roughs might not be afraid of the dowagers to whom allusion had been made, the dowagers might very well be excused if they were afraid of the roughs. He felt bound to vote with the hon. Member for York in the interest of liberty and the rights of the masses.

MR. SCOURFIELD remarked that if the majesty of the law were obscured by the assembling of thousands in the Parks on a Sunday, it was some consolation to know that it would be vindicated the next day probably by a policeman ordering a little boy looking into a fruit shop to "move on."

MR. C. E. LEWIS said, that he could not vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Lowther) because he believed that if it were carried it would only aggravate the evils complained of. He advised therefore that the Motion should be withdrawn.

MR. J. LOWTHER in reply, said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was connected with a constituency who were exceedingly fond of processions, and his views on the subject might therefore be peculiar. He (Mr. Lowther) must insist on taking the sense of the House upon his Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was not possible for the Government to support the Amendment, on account of the words with which it closed, and they would therefore vote against both the Amendment and the original Motion.

Mr. J. G. Talbot

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 142; Noes 46: Majority 96.

MR. W. H. SMITH rose to entreat his hon. Friend the Member for York to withdraw his Motion. A statement had been made to the effect that during the debate which took place last year no hon. Member representing the metropolis had spoken on the Motion before the House. ["No, no!"] He understood the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to give an assurance on the part of the Government that the Act of Parliament which had been passed on the subject of the Parks, and the Rules which had the force of law and had obtained the sanction of Government, would be observed so far as the police and the Government were concerned. The responsibility for the observance of the Rules practically rested with the Government, and he desired that that responsibility should be left with them. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman had practically given an undertaking that decent and orderly people who desired to use the Park for purposes of recreation would not be disturbed in that use, that the trees would be preserved from destruction, that open robbery and insult would not be permitted in the Park—in other words, that the police would do their duty. Respecting that assurance, and believing that it would be thoroughly respected by the Government, he thought it was desirable that the hon. Member for York should withdraw his Motion.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the position which his hon. Friend occupied in the House and in the metropolis caused him to be listened to with respect, especially by one sitting on the same side of the House, and under the circumstances he felt it was only due to him to listen to his suggestion. The Motion was in the hands of the House, but it was not his wish to press it ["Divide!"].

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member wish to withdraw his Motion. ["No, no!"] Does the House wish the Motion to be withdrawn? ["No!"]

ARMY.—EASTER MONDAY REVIEWS.

QUESTIONS.

LORD ELCHO wished to put a Question to his right hon Friend the Secretary of State for War in order to ascertain his opinions with respect to those Easter Monday Reviews. The Reviews in question were spontaneous on the part of the Metropolitan Volunteers, who were not compelled to take part in them; they were originated by Lord Ranelagh about four years ago, they had met with great success, and become very popular. The opinion of General Ellice last year was favourable to these reviews. It was said to their disparagement that the Volunteers were only anxious to show themselves, that the Reviews did not contribute to efficiency, and that they ought to be discouraged. Sir Hope Grant was the first to issue a Report that was unfavourable, and a letter was in consequence addressed to the Secretary of State asking whether he would give them his sanction. A reply was received from Lord Northbrook last year on the part of the Secretary of State, to the effect that the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief did not think these Reviews contributed to efficiency, but that if the Volunteers wished, permission would be accorded to hold them. They held their Review last Easter Monday, and the Report of the Quartermaster General was favourable. Subsequently a new regulation came out from the War Office, which stated that those large Reviews should not be counted towards efficiency. The impression produced was that the Secretary of State wished to discourage them. The Metropolitan commanding officers met to consider what they should do on Easter Monday, and they came to the conclusion to ask the Secretary of State whether he thought it was desirable that these Reviews should be held. The answer they received was not a direct answer, but merely stated that in the event of the commanding officers thinking it desirable that such Reviews should be held, he would not object to it. They were however already aware that there was no objection on their part, but they had hoped to learn whether in the opinion of the Secretary of State they were or were not desirable. The Metropolitan commanding officers felt it would be indecorous in them to enter into any correspondence on the subject, and resolved that, in the absence of any expression of opinion that these Reviews were conducive to the good of the force, it was not desirable that they should go out this year. The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. H. B. Samuelson) had asked the Question whether any objection was raised on the part of the Secretary of State to these Reviews, but the question which ought to have been put was whether the right hon. Gentleman considered these Reviews were or were not beneficial to the force. That was the Question he wished now to put, in no hostile spirit, but in the interest of the force, which he knew the right hon. Gentleman had at heart.

MR. CHARLEY remarked that the Metropolitan Volunteers were strongly in favour of the Easter Monday Reviews, as much advantage accrued to them from parading with the regular forces. He wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had any objection to a Review of the Guards and of the Volunteers of London taking place on Easter Monday; and if not, whether he would give orders that it should take place?

MR. CARDWELL in reply, said, that in reference to the last question, if it was desired to have an answer from him upon a military arrangement he should have had notice to enable him to consult the military authorities upon the subject. With regard to the Questions of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), he would say, in the first place, that he had always considered that the main reason for not holding the Easter Monday Review this year was one which had reference to railway fares. [Lord Elcho: That was one element.] He understood it was no inconsiderable element. Two years ago Sir Hope Grant, who commanded at Aldershot, reviewed the Volunteers at Brighton, and his opinion was unfavourable to holding these Reviews at all in the manner in which they were held. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief expressed his concurrence in the opinion so expressed. That was made known to the Volunteer officers, who expressed their willingness to accommodate themselves to any new arrangements that might be suggested. The War Office was, therefore, willing to facilitate the holding of these Reviews under new arrangements, and the Report of the Quartermaster-General was much more favourable than that of Sir Hope Grant. Then came the question whether there should be a Review this year, and he (Mr. Cardwell) was asked to express an opinion whether it was desirable it should be held. This divided itself into two parts, and so far as the military question was concerned he could not hold a different opinion from that expressed by the Commander-in-Chief and other military authorities; but as these Reviews were exceedingly popular, and were supposed to tend to encourage the force, as a sincere friend to the Volunteer cause, and wishing that their numbers and efficiency should be kept up, he had no hesitation in expressing his wish to encourage them on that ground. With regard to the military grounds, the War Office stood simply upon the Reports of Sir Hope Grant and General Ellice. If the Volunteer officers made an application for an Easter Review to the Government, he should be prepared to give to it his cordial concurrence; and he thought he could promise that the military authorities would do all they could to make such arrangements as were calculated to produce the effects mentioned in General Ellice's letter. He repeated he should give his cordial support to every measure tending to make the force a popular and useful one, and he was confident that His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and those immediately under him, would most willingly co-operate with him in that object. The Report of the Royal Commissioners was against attendance at Easter Monday Reviews counting towards efficiency.

LORD ELCHO asked whether the officers of the force might come to the conclusion that the Reviews, as they had been conducted since the Report of Sir Hope Grant, were viewed with favour by the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. CARDWELL had already stated that he would stand by the Report of General Ellice.

MR. CHARLEY gave notice that he would repeat his Question to the right hon. Gentleman to-morrow.

MR. CARDWELL said, the initiative rested with the commanding officers of the Volunteer force, and if they should hold a meeting and address a letter conveying the result to him, he would give it every consideration.

REGISTER FOR PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTORS BILL.

[BILL 66.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. PELL moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, on the ground that the Schedules contained certain serious errors, both as regarded dates and references to Acts of Parliament.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Pell)—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped that the House would not adopt the proposition, as it was necessary—if the Bill were to be put in force this year—that it should pass as speedily as possible. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pell) could only discover three alleged errors as to dates, but those could be easily rectified in a Committee of the Whole House.

MR. HUNT said, it was unreasonable to expect the House to proceed with the Bill, when important changes had been introduced into it, only with two days' notice. Little delay would ensue from referring the Bill to a Select Committee; but if that course were not adopted, at any rate time should be given to examine the scheme as now proposed.

MR. COLLINS suggested that the Bill should be passed through Committee pro forma, in order that it might be reprinted with the Amendments of the Attorney General, which would make it practically a new measure.

MR. HIBBERT said, the Government would be satisfied with simply going into Committee, and having taken that stage Progress would at once be reported and further consideration of the Bill postponed until to-morrow.

MR. WHARTON drew attention to the circumstance that the Bill would injuriously affect the Revising Barristers.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS was astonished at the immense mass of Amendments proposed by Government, and thought the best plan would be to go into Committee pro forma.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Colonel Barttelot.)

The House divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 64: Majority 19.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. C. LEWIS supported the Amendment for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL assented to the Motion for going into Committee pro forma on the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Pell) withdrawing his Motion for a Select Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 105]; re-committed for Monday next.

AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES (CUSTOMS DUTIES) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law with respect to Customs Duties in the Australasian Colonies.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGHESSEN and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 106.]

CONVEYANCING (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary BRUCE, Bill to amend the Law relating to Land Rights and Conveyancing, and to facilitate the Transfer of Land in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary BRUCE, The LORD ADVOCATE, and Mr. WINTERBOTHAM.

METROPOLITAN COMMONS SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WINTERBOTHAM, Bill to confirm a scheme under "The Metropolitan Commons Act, 1866," relating to Tooting Beck Common, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WINTERBOTHAM and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 107.]

House adjourned at

INVESTMENT OF CAPITAL IN LAND, MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY rose to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the facilities afforded by the existing law for the investment of capital in the improvement of land, and to report whether any alteration of the law is requisite in order further to encourage such investment. The noble Marquess was proceeding to give reasons for his Motion, when—

EARL GRANVILLE begged the noble Marquess's pardon for interrupting him; but he begged to suggest that a longer Notice should have been given of so important a Motion. He had not heard the noble Marquess give public Notice of his intention to move for this Committee, and he believed that the Notice which appeared on the Table to-day was only handed to the Clerk at the Table last evening. He did not suppose there would be any objection to such an Inquiry as that proposed by the noble Marquess; but he thought it would be as well if the Motion were not moved until Monday, in order that noble Lords on both sides of the House might have an opportunity of expressing their opinion on it if they should think fit to do so.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that he did not wish to be guilty of any discourtesy to their Lordships, but he thought to bring forward the Motion in fulfilment of a pledge he gave the House last year. In putting his Motion on the Paper only last evening, he did not think he was guilty of any discourtesy, because as his Notice really dated from last year, when he gave the pledge to which he had just referred, he thought it was an unusually long one. However, after the observations of the noble Earl, he would, of course, postpone the matter until Monday.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR COMMITTEE—PENSIONS TO CONSULS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the intention of the Foreign Office to carry out the recommendation of the Diplomatic and Consular Committee, by allowing an increased rate of pension to those Consuls who have served in unhealthy climates?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Lord Granville is causing inquiries to be made into our Consular establishments in certain countries, and, pending the result of such investigations, I apprehend that no decision will be taken upon those recommendations of the late Committee upon the Diplomatic and Consular Service, which might possibly entail further public expenditure, and must require the assent of the Treasury before they could be carried out.

COURT OF ROME — RELIGIOUS CORPORATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If there be any objection to lay upon the Table Copy of the Instructions sent to the British Minister at the Court of Rome with regard to the Religious Corporations, and to state on what grounds Great Britain claims to interfere?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, [the instructions to Sir Augustus Paget and to Mr. Clarke Jervoise from the Foreign Office, with the view of obtaining immunity from confiscation for such foreign religious establishments as this country is interested in, were laid before Parliament in February, 1871, being included in the "Correspondence on the Affairs of Rome for 1870-71." In this Correspondence the grounds were shown on which the various establishments base their claims for protection, and on which, in consequence, the instructions were given to Her Majesty's Representative. I may remind the hon. Member and the House that when the material interests of British subjects require friendly representations being made in their behalf to foreign Governments, such representations, when supported, should the occasion require, by the authority and opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, are made by Her Majesty's Government irrespective of class and of creed. Such a course has been followed in the present instance, and, with the concurrence of their Legal Advisers, Her Majesty's Government have addressed instructions to Sir Augustus Paget in the interests of those parties who were under the impression that they were threatened with expropriation of those establishments in which they are interested by the application to them of the provisions of the Bill now under consideration by the Italian Chamber; the question is still pending, and the Bill has not yet been passed. I cannot undertake to lay upon the Table any additional Papers upon this subject; but if the hon. Gentleman will refer to a letter signed by Mr. Hammond from the Foreign Office on February 22 in this year, and which appeared in The Pall Mall Gazette of February 27, I think he will find in the contents of that letter an exhaustive résumé of the present state of this question.

PRISON MINISTERS COMMITTEE, 1870.

QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the Evidence delivered before the Prison Ministers Committee in 1870, and the Report made by it to the House; whether he is aware that considerable numbers of persons detained at the will of Her Majesty have no regular or certain means of obtaining religious instruction in accordance with the tenets of their several communities, in consequence of the non-appointment of salaried ministers of such communities by certain county and borough prison authorities; and, whether Government will in this Session bring in a Bill to cure such defect, or name an early day at the disposal of Government for the consideration of the Bill thereon, which came down last year from the House of Peers, and has lately been read a first time in this House?

MR. CLARE READ: Before the right hon. Gentleman rises to answer, I should also like to ask him, Whether, after the Resolution agreed to by the House of Commons last Session, with reference to the charges imposed upon the rate-payers for national objects, it is the intention of the Government to support any measure incurring the expenditure of rates for the administration of justice?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, undoubtedly the attention of the Government has been called to the Report and evidence referred to, and the Government last year introduced a Bill dealing with the matter, but press of other business prevented its being proceeded with. I am aware that a considerable number of persons who are detained in prison are without any regular means of religious instruction supplied at the public expense. I hope that the grievance complained of may in time be overcome by the spontaneous action of the local authorities. As far as the Government are concerned, we are not, with the limited time at our disposal, in a position at present to deal with the subjects. Our sympathies are with the hon. Baronet; but we cannot give him up a Government evening for his purpose. I trust the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) will accept this as an answer also to his Question.

THE SUEZ CANAL—SHIPPING TOLLS. QUESTION.

MR. DENISON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any steps are being taken at Constantinople or elsewhere to arrest the introduction of increased and prohibitory shipping tolls on the Suez Canal?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Her Majesty's Government, Sir, have given their most careful attention to this matter, and have been in communication for some time past with the Governments of other maritime countries respecting it. The whole question of the Dues on the Canal is now under the consideration of the Porte, and Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople has been instructed to urge that the interests of the shipowners should be duly regarded.

ARMY—THE VOLUNTEERS. THE EASTER MONDAY REVIEW. QUESTIONS.

MR. CHARLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has any objection to give orders that a Review of Guardsmen and Volunteers be held near London on Easter Monday?

MR. CARDWELL: As I fully explained, Sir, last night, the initiation of such a review rests, not with me, but with the commanding officers, as the expense is borne by the Volunteers, and not by the public. There is a sum voted in the Estimates for a brigade drill of every Volunteer Corps once a year, who may be brigaded with regular troops. This is in the discretion of the General Officer of the district, who arranges the time with the commanding officers of Volunteers, and I understand that such arrangements are now being made by the General of the Home District, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar.

MR. CHARLEY asked, whether it was necessary that all the commanding officers should apply?

MR. CARDWELL said, the regular course was that the committee of commanding officers should take the matter into consideration and should communicate with the General Officer, which in this case had not been done.

MERCANTILE MARINE—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is prepared to inform the House as to the names of the gentlemen the Government will recommend to Her Majesty as Royal Commissioners to inquire into the condition of the Mercantile Marine and report thereon, and also as to the terms of the reference?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: I am able, Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman to state to the House the form of the Reference which is to be made to the Royal Commission about to be constituted, and the names of its Members. The form of Reference will be this: That a Commission should forthwith issue to make inquiry with regard to the alleged unseaworthiness of British ships arising from overloading, deck-loading, defective construction, condition, equipment, form, or machinery, age, or improper stowage; and also to inquire into the present system of Marine Insurance, and the state of the law on the liability of shipowners for injury to those whom they employ, and the effects of under-manning ships; and to suggest the best remedy for the removal of such evils as may have arisen from the matters aforesaid. With respect to the names which had been selected, and had received the approval of Her Majesty, they are as follows:—The Duke of Somerset (Chairman), His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, the right hon. T. Milner Gibson, Admiral Sir James Hope, the hon. Henry George Liddell, M.P., Mr. Thomas Brassey, M.P., Mr. Henry Cadogan Rothery, Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty; Mr. Arthur Cohen, Barrister-at-law; Mr. Peter Denny, of an eminent ship-building firm at Dumbarton; Mr. George Duncan, member of the committee of Lloyd's Register; Captain Edward Dover Edgell, head of the Survey Staff of Lloyd's Salvage Association; and Mr. Charles Watkin Merrifield, Principal of the Royal School of Naval Architecture and Engineering. Instructions are contained in the Warrant, to the effect that the Commission shall first and separately report to Her Majesty upon the question of overloading; and shall secondly and separately report upon the question of unseaworthiness and defective construction.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—CASE OF THE "MAGGIE."—QUESTION.

MR. R. W. DUFF asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in the case of the four seamen of the brig "Maggie" recently sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour in Edinburgh Gaol, it having been admitted in evidence that the Captain intended to proceed on a long voyage short-handed, that did not constitute a sufficient reason for the crew refusing to sail; and, if so, will the right hon. Gentleman communicate with the Home Secretary with a view to the immediate release of the prisoners?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, he could not give his hon. Friend any information in this case at the present moment, because it did not come directly before the Board of Trade. It was a case of criminal procedure, which had gone to the Home Office. He could not give an opinion on the legal question, but he was in communication with the Home Office on the subject.

UNIVERSITY TESTS (DUBLIN) BILL.

(Mr. Fawcett, Dr. Lyon Playfair, Mr. Plunket.)

WITHDRAWAL OF BILL. RULES OF THE HOUSE.

MR. CALLAN rose to put a Question on a point of Order. The second reading of the University Tests (Dublin) Bill had been fixed for the 2nd of April, and he wished to know whether the Bill could be permitted to proceed, having been materially altered by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) since it was read a first time? The hon. Member stated in introducing the measure on the 7th of February, that it had been accepted by a large majority, and was, in fact the Bill of the House; and, on the 20th of March, in reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), he said that the delay in printing the Bill—

"had been caused by his anxiety to consider, and if possible to meet, the objections urged against his measure by the Prime Minister and others in the recent debate."

It now turned out that the hon. Member for Brighton had got printed quite a different Bill from that which he had introduced, the constitution and powers of the Governing Body of Trinity College and the University of Dublin being entirely different in the Bills of 1872 and 1873. The reason why he asked the Question was this:—The Bill had been put down for second reading on Wednesday next, and as it was a measure on which much interest was felt in Ireland, Irish Members would be saved the necessity of coming over, and other Members the trouble of coming down to the House, if it were now ruled that the second reading could not proceed on that day. He believed the usual course was this:—When a Bill was introduced and ordered to be read a first time, it was not the practice to have it printed, especially in a perfect shape. For the convenience of Members, the practice was that the clerks in the Public Bill Office took the title of the Bill from its introducer, who might then bring in a dummy Bill. But the theory was that the Bill was introduced in a perfect shape. Now, the measure before the House he conceived to be an abuse of all procedure and all precedent, because the introducer of the Bill stated that it was the Bill which was read a second time last year, and led the House to believe that it was in a perfect shape, the fact being that the clauses were not then settled by the draftsman, or even in the mind of the hon. Member himself. The Bill, which should have been printed on the 7th of February, was not delivered to Irish Members until late on Tuesday, and it was only on Wednesday that his attention was directed by the Press to the fact that material alterations had been made in it. A case in point, reported in Burke's Precedents, had occurred on the 18th of February, 1850, when Mr. Stuart Wortley, in reply to a Question asked by Sir R. H. Inglis, said that his Bill on the subject of marriage with a deceased wife's sister had been delayed because he desired to frame a clause in accordance with the wishes of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth. Sir R. H. Inglis contended that—

"Though any Member having obtained leave of the House to prepare and bring in a Bill on any subject, might take days, weeks, or months for the purpose, he could not, when once he had brought up such a Bill, and when the House had received and read it, make any alteration whatever in it. It was no longer his property, any more than that of any other individual Member, and could not be altered by any one. The House alone could then deal with it."—[3 Hansard, cviii. 969.]

The Speaker of the day (Mr. C. S. Lefevre) ruled

"That it was not competent for an hon. Member to make any other than a clerical alteration in a Bill which had once been introduced and read a first time."—[Ibid.]

He had only to refer to the fifth, sixth, and seventh clauses in proof that the Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton was not the measure which last year received a second reading; and, under the circumstances, he begged to ask Mr. Speaker, Whether the hon. Member for Brighton was in Order in proposing to proceed with the Bill which stood for reading a second time on Wednesday next.

Mr. FAWCETT said, it might not be inappropriate, before an opinion was expressed from the Chair, that he should state the facts of the case, and at once he was prepared to admit that the hon. Member had stated the facts correctly. He introduced the Bill on the first day of the Session, but did not get it printed because there was a probability then, another Bill on the same subject would pass the House, and, of course, if it had done so there would have been no use in troubling the House with his Bill. As the discussion on the University Bill of the Government proceeded, the Bill of which he was in charge was frequently referred to, many objections were pointed out to it by the Prime Minister and other eminent Members of the House, and the sole reason for altering it was that its promoters thought they would be paying more respect to the Prime Minister and the other distinguished Members to whom he had referred if they endeavoured as far as possible to meet their objections. As far as he was concerned, and he believed he was expressing the opinion of his two hon. Friends whose names were on the back of the Bill, it never once entered their minds that they were infringing, or disregarding even, a technical Rule of the House in adopting the course they had done. He now found that they had done so, and in his own name and in that of his hon. Friends he begged to say that they deeply regretted that they should have unintentionally disregarded a Rule of the House. He had no doubt that the House would accept his assurance that the error was entirely unintentional. But, having made this admission, the next question was, what had they better do? It seemed to him that the best thing to be done was this—As far as he understood the question, the leave which he obtained to introduce a Bill dealing with the Dublin University was still operative. He, therefore, with the permission of the Speaker, would ask to be allowed again to present another Bill to the House, and would then move that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Bill put down for Wednesday next be read and discharged. If that Order should be discharged, he should then fix the second reading of the Bill, which he now begged to be allowed to bring in, for the same day. He greatly regretted that the course which had been adopted by his hon. Friend (Mr. Callan), if this were done, would not be so fruitful of advantage, as the hon. Member had thought that he had no alternative. He should deeply regret if, through an oversight on his part, a question which needed settlement should in any way suffer. Still, he had no alternative in the matter. He would only add this much more. ["Order."] He was perfectly well aware that there was no chance whatever of passing the Bill, even if this point of Order had not been raised, unless he and those who acted with him should obtain considerable indulgence from the House and the Government. He did not think, under the circumstances, that indulgence they would be less likely to receive now. In conclusion, he would simply say that he hoped the course which he had suggested would meet with the approval of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair and also of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) has exercised a sound discretion in taking the course which he proposes to adopt. There is no principle more clearly laid down in this House than this—when a Member has introduced a Bill to the House it ceases to be in that Member's hands, and passes into the possession of the House. No essential alteration of that Bill, at any stage, may then be made without the distinct Order of the House. I may remind the House that that principle applies with special force when the House proposes to go into Committee pro forma on a Bill in order to meet objections to that Bill, raised on the second reading. Upon those occasions it is clearly established that no alteration can be introduced in a Bill inconsistent with the general character of the Bill. The House has laid down a clear course for Members to take if they desire to make any essential alteration in a Bill of which they have charge at any stage. That course is to ask the leave of the House to withdraw the Bill, and to present another instead thereof. That is the proper course to take, and that is the course which, as I understand, the hon. Member proposes to take. If that be so, the first Question to be put to the House will be that the Order of the Day for the second reading of the University Tests (Dublin) Bill be read and discharged, and that the Bill be withdrawn. Should the House think proper to agree to that Motion, it will rest with the hon. Member for Brighton to ask leave to present another Bill in lieu thereof; and when the new Bill has been presented and read a first time, to name for the second reading Wednesday next, or any other day he may think fit. The Question, therefore, which, in pursuance of the hon. Member's desire, I have to put to the House is—"That the Order of the Day for the second reading of the University Tests (Ireland) Bill upon Wednesday next be read and discharged."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I wish to put it to you, Sir, whether the second reading will take precedence of the other Orders on Wednesday?

MR. SPEAKER: If the House should allow the hon. Member for Brighton to present another Bill, he can fix the second reading for the day he thinks proper. Of course, it will take its place after the other Orders of the Day already appointed for that day.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Is it, Mr. Speaker, competent to debate the Question that the Order of the Day be discharged?

MR. SPEAKER: In accordance with the Rules of the House, I have put the Question—"That the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Bill on Wednesday next be read and discharged." That Question may be debated; but, according to the ordinary rules of debate, the discussion must be germane to the question.

Question put, and agreed to.

Order read and discharged.

MR. SPEAKER: I have now to put the Question—"That the Bill be withdrawn." The Ayes have it.

Bill withdrawn.

MR. FAWCETT: Mr. Speaker, I beg to present the Bill to the House, and to move that it be read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to present another Bill instead thereof."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is—"That leave be given to present another Bill instead thereof."

Mr. Fawcett

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg, Sir, to point out—it appears to me that it is quite unnecessary for the hon. Member for Brighton to give Notice of a new Bill.

SIR JOHN ESMONDE: The hon. Member obtained leave to bring in one Bill on a statement which he made to the House—can he, without Notice, introduce another Bill?

MR. COLLINS: I would ask, Sir, as a point of Order, whether the hon. Member for Brighton can interfere with the programme for this evening? Orders of the Day on Friday have precedence over Notices, and he cannot take precedence of the Orders and the four Notices of Motion now on the Paper.

MR. GOLDNEY: The Bill has been withdrawn; but I apprehend it is not competent for the hon. Member for Brighton to introduce another Bill without giving Notice.

MR. DODSON: I wish to say a few words on the point of Order. The position, as I understand it, is this—the hon. Member for Brighton has obtained leave to withdraw his Bill, and the Bill is withdrawn. But the Order of Leave, as stated by you, Sir, to introduce a Bill on this subject still holds good, and the hon. Member upon that Order asks leave to present another Bill. The Question I have to put to you, Sir, is whether it is not in accordance with precedent, under the circumstances, that leave should be given to enable the hon. Member to present the Bill without further Notice? If leave be given to present that Bill, the hon. Member at the close of the sitting may bring up that new Bill in the same manner as if it were a Bill brought in under an Order of Leave given.

MR. SPEAKER: The House is now engaged in dealing with a point of Order, and it is according to the usual practice that the point of Order should be determined, and effect given to that determination. No Notice on the part of the hon. Member for Brighton is necessary in order to raise the Question whether he should or should not be permitted to present another Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson) has correctly stated the practice of the House. The Order of Leave to introduce a Bill is still operative, and the only question now to be determined is whether the hon. Member for Brighton shall be allowed to present another Bill instead of that withdrawn. Of course, whether the hon. Member for Brighton shall be allowed to do so or not must be left to the House; but no Notice in respect of that Motion is necessary.

MR. HERON: I wish to know, Sir, whether leave having been given to the hon. Member for Brighton to introduce a Bill on the 7th of February, he can now on the same leave introduce a Bill different in principle.

MR. BOUVERIE: I believe, Sir, in such a case as that now before the House, where a Bill from some informality is withdrawn and a new Bill presented, the invariable practice has been to allow the Bill to be brought in by the Member at once; and no Notice is requisite. Leave having been given to introduce a Bill, it may be presented at any time. Being introduced on that Order it will then be read a first time.

MR. SYNAN: In that case I should like to know how we are to debate the first reading. We may have to take a division on the first reading.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that leave be given to present another Bill instead thereof.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: We have been taken by surprise. We do not know what the new Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton will be; and we should have time to consider the course to be pursued. I beg to move the adjournment of this debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Downing.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said that the two hon. Gentlemen who had last spoken could be in no want of information as to the provisions of the Bill which the hon. Member for Brighton wished to present. Every one in the House was perfectly conversant with its proposals.

THE O'CONOR DON wished to ask the Speaker, Whether the withdrawal of a Bill differed from the second reading having been negatived. If the original leave covered a new Bill, why should it not cover a Bill which had been defeated on the second reading?

MR. SPEAKER: Any hon. Member who has obtained the leave of the House to introduce a Bill is at liberty to suspend the introduction of that Bill and to alter it in any way he thinks proper, provided it is not so altered as to be inconsistent with his original leave. As long as the Bill is introduced in consistency with the Order of Leave, he is quite in order in laying it on the Table of the House; but when once laid on the Table of the House, it is not regular that it should be altered in essential particulars. The hon. Member for Brighton having, as acknowledged by himself, altered his Bill in essential particulars, asks leave to present another Bill. There are several instances of the same kind on record, and in all those instances hon. Members have presented another Bill, and without Notice. The hon. Member for Brighton is therefore in order in now proposing to present to this House another Bill, without Notice.

MR. GLADSTONE: It appears to me that there is an amount of difficulty in the position in which we are placed. The ruling of the Speaker has been perfectly clear, that although it was necessary for the hon. Member for Brighton to ask permission to present his Bill, he could do so without Notice. Then the question arises as to the position of Members who, like the hon. Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. Synan), desire to oppose the Bill on the first reading. [Several hon. MEMBERS: He cannot now.] They cannot oppose a Bill on its first reading? I recollect that great battles have been fought on the first readings of Bills. I remember a declaration by Lord Russell in 1842 that he would oppose the Income Tax Bill on the first, second, and third readings, and he was as good as his word. The Motion for the first reading usually follows the presentation of the Bill; but in this case the presentation recurs without any Notice. It will be rather hard on my hon. Friend, supposing he wishes to oppose the first reading, that he should have no course open to him except to watch the entire proceedings of the House before and after the discussion of Orders of the Day, in order to make sure that the first reading is not taken. In lieu of adjourning the debate, for which there is no necessity, as the question at issue is perfectly clear, the convenient course would be for the hon. Member for Brighton to give Notice that he will move the first reading on Monday. It is not usual that such a proceeding as this should occur at all, for usually every Member has Notice of the introduction of a Bill, and then takes his own course with reference to the first reading. I doubt whether it is consistent with the privileges of Members to have to watch the proceedings of the House in the way I have described; and, without raising the abstract question of procedure, the whole difficulty might be met if the hon. Member for Brighton gives Notice of the first reading for Monday, and he would then be in plenty of time to fix the second reading on the day he desires.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: I differ from the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Brighton having admitted that his Bill is not in accordance with his statement of it on the first reading, the Speaker has ruled that it ought to be withdrawn. But there stands on our Journals the Order that he has leave to introduce a Bill for the better government of the University of Dublin. The Speaker has told us that, under these circumstances, the custom, for which there are several precedents, is to introduce another Bill. Now, if the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) intended to oppose the Bill when first introduced, there would be some reason for deferring the first reading; but he had no such intention, and it would be rather hard on the hon. Member for Brighton to take advantage of the new state of things and oppose the presentation of his Bill. It is for the House to judge whether the hon. Member should be put in the same position he was in before with his fresh Bill.

MR. BOUVERIE: The House, or a portion of it, does not seem aware of the Standing Order of 1852 on the question. That Order provides that, a Bill having been introduced in pursuance of an Order of the House, "the Question that it be now read a first time and printed shall be decided without Amendment or debate."

MR. DODSON suggested that if the Motion for the adjournment of the debate were withdrawn, a decision might very shortly be arrived at, by taking the sense of the House on the Question whether the hon. Member for Brighton should be allowed to present his new Bill.

MR. MORRISON: The course which my hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett) proposes to take is one commonly adopted with Government Bills. As to the view of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that the first reading should be postponed till Monday—is there any instance of a Government of either political party having given Notice in such a case? If the first reading is deferred till Monday, the convenience of the printers in distributing the Bill will be interfered with. We are discussing a mere question of form, for my hon. Friend is about to present the very Bill which has been in our hands the last 10 days.

MR. CARDWELL: Before we consider the practical consequences, we should have regard to adherence to the Rules, which are distinctly laid down in the volume to which we always refer in such cases. It says—

“If a Bill has been received in either House the Question is put ‘that this Bill be now read a first time,’ which is rarely objected to, either in the Lords or Commons, and in the Commons can only be opposed by a Division. When the Question of the first reading is negatived the House merely determines it shall not be now read a first time, and the Question may therefore be repeated on a future day, as in the case of the County Elections Bill in 1832 which was twice negatived.”

The Question now is that the hon. Member for Brighton be permitted to present another Bill, and that Motion any Member may resist.

Motion, “That the Debate be now adjourned,” put, and negatived.

MR. SYNAN said, it had been denied by some Members that a Bill could be opposed on the first reading, and that the House could divide on the first reading. He would remind those hon. Members, however, that in the present Session a measure proposed by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was opposed on the first reading, when a division was taken.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

UNIVERSITY TESTS (DUBLIN) (No. 2) BILL.—“to abolish Tests and alter the Constitution of the Governing Body in Trinity College and the University of Dublin,” presented accordingly; read the first time; to be read a second time upon Wednesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 109.]

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVE PEERS (SCOTLAND AND IRELAND).

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. STAPLETON rose to call attention to the mode of electing Representative Peers of Scotland and Ireland. The hon. Member said, that on a previous occasion he had called attention to the defects of the present system of electing Representative Peers both in Scotland and Ireland. It was generally admitted that the existing system was unsatisfactory, and that its revision and reform were urgently called for. In 1869 he obtained leave to bring in a Bill on the subject; but by the advice of the Prime Minister, who, agreeing with him in the need of a reform, thought that an opportunity should be afforded to the House of Lords of taking the initiative in the matter, he did not attempt to carry it beyond the first reading. Subsequently, in the same year, a Bill was introduced in the House of Lords by Earl Grey, which was an improvement, in one respect, on the measure he had himself presented to this House. His proposal was to restrict the votes to be given by each Peer to a fewer number than the number of Peers to be returned. He had followed the precedent furnished by the House of Lords itself, which had introduced the three-cornered constituencies into the Reform Bill, not venturing to go further. Earl Grey's Bill was based on the principle of the Cumulative Vote. In that way it was hoped that the representation of a minority might be secured. At present all or nearly all the Representative Peers were of one complexion, and did not fairly or adequately represent the various opinions of the constituencies by whom they were supposed to be elected. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) by his Bill interfered with the provision contained in the Scotch Act of Union, under which the Representative Peers were elected for each Parliament. This was probably the reason why the Bill met with considerable obstruction, though not actual opposition in the House of Lords. The Duke of Buccleuch, who always took a great share in the return of Representative Peers for Scotland, moved its reference to a Select Committee, and upon that Motion a debate arose in which the Duke of Argyll, Earl Granville, and several independent Peers spoke in favour of the Bill. The Marquess of Salisbury also expressed himself to the following effect:—

"If the present Motion were for rejecting the Bill I certainly should not vote for it. In the present state of my convictions I am not disposed to vote against the principle of the Bill."
—[3 Hansard, cxcv. 1688.]

Lord Cairns, himself the author of the Minority Clause in the Reform Bill was the chief speaker against the Bill on that occasion. But he thought it might be fairly said that no one objected to its principle. For even Lord Cairns was not satisfied with the existing state of things. The noble Lord was in favour of some system by which all the Scotch and Irish Peers might eventually take their seats in the House of Lords; but he, for one, was opposed to such a step, which would be contrary to the agreement made with those countries at the time of their respective Unions. Lord Cairns' argument was open to an easy answer. The noble Lord had maintained that because Scotland had so increased in relative wealth and population since the Union that she had been found entitled to an increased number of Representatives in the House of Commons; therefore she was entitled to an increased representation in the House of Lords through Representative Peers. But this argument entirely lost sight of the fact that there had been no Peers of England created since the Union. The only Peers created since the Union with Scotland were Peers of Great Britain and Peers of the United Kingdom, the former before and the latter since the Union with Ireland. A Scotch commoner had always as good a chance as an English one of being made a Peer of Great Britain or of the United Kingdom. It was true that for 80 years Scotch Peers, not being Representative Peers, were excluded from the House of Lords, although they had been created Peers of Great Britain, or had even inherited English Peerages. But that disability had long been removed; and no one could deny that the possession of a Scotch or Irish Peerage was a vantage ground which gave a man a better chance of getting in the House of Lords than that possessed by a commoner of equal means and position. A Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to consider the Bill, and the proceedings were very dark and very curious. They too evidence, but it was never distributed except among themselves, and he could never procure a copy of it. A still more extraordinary thing was that the Report they presented had little or nothing to do with the subject-matter of the Bill. The division in the Upper House on the Irish Church Bill gave rise to further discussion on this subject. On that occasion four Irish Representative Peers voted with the Government; but the circumstance only showed that the time had come for the passage of that measure, and not that a great change had occurred in the feelings of the Representative Peers. When the important question of the Abolition of Purchase, 29 Scotch and Irish Representative Peers voted against it, and only three for it. This was followed by the publication in The Times of a very strong article insisting on the necessity of changing the mode of electing Representative Peers. There was this difference between the Scotch and Irish Representative Peers—that the former were elected at the commencement of every new Parliament, while the electors of the latter was for life, and consequently an election took place on the death of every Representative Peer. There would be no difficulty in introducing the Cumulative Vote at the Scotch elections. An arrangement would be necessary in the case of the Irish elections, and might be made in the way he would indicate. The four seats in the House of Lords formerly occupied by the Irish Bishops and Archbishops were now vacant, and he thought in justice to Ireland, those seats should be filled up. At least, the number might be fixed at not less than 28, and not more than 32. By that arrangement the elections could be by batches of five, and then the Cumulative Vote would have its play. The change he recommended was due to the minority, who at present were excluded from any share of representation in the House of Lords; and it was also due to the Hereditary Peers of England, for it often happened that, while a majority of those Peers voted upon the popular side, the vote was changed by the dead-weight of the Representative Peers.

MR. VANCE said, he did not remember any proposal being made by the House of Lords to alter the constitution of the House of Commons. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwick was to alter one of the fundamental articles of the Act of Union. It was true that one of the most solemn Articles in the Act of Union had been violated by the measure which swept away the Irish Church. But the more the clauses of the Act of Union were altered, the stronger was the argument for repealing that Act altogether. The hon. Member had spoken of the Irish Peers being generally of one complexion in their political view. No doubt this was so, and the reason was that the constituency were all of one complexion. Still, of late years there had existed very little difficulty in distinguished Conservative Irish Peers finding their way into the House of Lords by being created English Peers. His own impression was that by this means an inequality arising out of the elective representative system was corrected by the large number of Irish Liberal Peers who had been created English Peers by successive Liberal Governments. Very few instances of such creations had taken place under Conservative Governments, and therefore he was of opinion that the House should be very careful in dealing with any proposal to trench upon the privileges and alter the constitution of the House of Lords.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that when this subject was before brought under notice by his hon. Friend, he had stated it was in the House of Lords that the question must originate if any practical result were hoped for. He was sorry that august Assembly had shown no disposition to deal with the present method of electing Representative Peers. It might appear that upon such a question anyone upon the Liberal side of the House must speak from party interest, because the existing mode of election operated very disadvantageously to the Liberal party. He could not help saying, however, that, while he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) in strongly opposing the principle of minority representation in the House of Commons, one essential reason for this opposition was that the variety existing among the constituencies provided effectually for the representation of every variety of sentiment in the House, so that the House of Commons, on the whole, corresponded with the political opinions of the people from time to time. But this argument against the representation of minorities in the House of Commons entirely failed against the representation of the Scotch and Irish Peers, who were not represented in conformity with the various shades of opinion existing among them. The only argument in favour of the present mode of election was that just used by the hon. Gentleman opposite—"It is the mode provided in the Act of Union;" but, inasmuch as Parliament had altered the Act of Union in other points, it might alter the Act in this point. The evil, however, had been borne for some generations, and they must probably be content to bear it for some time longer. His hon. Friend suggested that the Government should propose in the House of Lords the change which he thought necessary. He could not, however, pledge himself to act upon this suggestion. The Government were in a decided minority in the House of Lords, and could not, therefore, with any advantage, take the initiative upon a question of considerable importance bearing on the constitution of the House of Lords. It was difficult for this, as for all Liberal Governments, to conduct the ordinary business of this country in the House of Lords; and he did not think it would be right on the part of the Government to endeavour to effect a change going beyond the ordinary course of business unless there was reason to suppose, from declarations made by the Members of the Opposition in the House of Lords, that they were inclined to give it a favourable reception. The practical mischief of the system of election was restrained partly by the number of Irish and Scotch Peers who had received peerages of the United Kingdom, and partly, also, in the case of Scotland, by the reduction in the aggregate number of those peerages. He could only say that, although hope did not always afford the prospect of a very substantial repast, they could only feed themselves with the hope that if a proposal something in the nature of minority representation should be introduced into the elections of Scotch and Irish Peers, as it had been introduced with advantage into the Governing Bodies of the Universities, that proposal might commend itself to the general sense and judgment of the House of Commons. It certainly would be more likely so to commend itself if they avoided anything like an attempt at officious pressure; and although he did not believe that his hon. Friend was in the slightest degree open to that charge, he did not think that the Government would be regarded as free from that accusation if they held out any expectation that, under the present circumstances, they contemplated making any proposal in that sense. He wished, too, that the public mind had been more turned to this question than appeared to have been the case. He could only account for the general indifference to the subject on the part of the public by the pressure of other important matters, combined with the sense that it was impossible to deal with them all effectually. He could not help feeling that they were indebted to his hon. Friend for bringing the subject before the House, and he could only express his hope that a view so reasonable as that of his hon. Friend would find favour at some happy juncture, though the time might not be quite close at hand.

MR. KINNAIRD, while he acknowledged, also regretted the public apathy in this question, but regarded the indifference of Scotchmen to their belief that in sending so many Liberal Members to that House they had secured sufficient and forcible expression of their opinions. He thought this was a question that ought not to be forced on the other House by this.

JURIES (IRELAND) ACT.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BRUEN rose to move that a Select Committee be appointed "To inquire into the operation of the Act 34 and 35 Vic. c. 65, Juries (Ireland) Act, and whether it is necessary to amend the same in order to secure the due administration of justice."

In doing so he would place before the House instances which had occurred in all parts of Ireland illustrating the effects of the law, and then ask the House to consider whether these effects were not traceable to the present state of the law, and whether an immediate inquiry ought not to be instituted? Previous to the 1st of January last, when the existing law came into operation, matters relating to juries were managed under an Act passed in 1833, and though that Act had in some respects become obsolete, it worked as a rule smoothly enough, except, perhaps, in times of agrarian or political disturbances. The principal changes made by the Act of last year were the taking away from the Sheriffs the discretion which they had hitherto exercised, and the reduction of the property qualification. Formerly the Sheriffs had been able to exclude from the panel all those who were known to be incompetent or disaffected, but no choice was now left them. He observed that Lord O'Hagan had stated in "another place" that the qualification as originally provided in the Bill was considerably reduced in the House of Commons after it had left the House of Lords. As a matter of fact, he found that the Bill reached the House of Commons at the fag end of the Session—on the 7th of July—when the House had been exhausted by the debates on the Ballot, that it was read a second time on the 18th of July between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning, and that it passed through Committee at about 2 o'clock on the morning of the 21st of July, when some Amendments were introduced without Notice. He did not mean to defend the qualifications in the Act of 1833, though they were good so far as they went; but he could not help protesting at the way in which so important a measure as this had been smuggled through the House. With respect to the nature of the qualification of jurors under the Bill, there were no less than five different qualifications, producing a most extraordinary and whimsical state of things in different parts of Ireland. The qualification for urban voters—the voters in cities, towns, and villages—was in 11 counties the occupation of premises of the value of £12 a-year. In Leitrim their qualification was £15. In all other parts of Ireland it was £20. For rural jurymen the qualification in any part of Ireland, with one exception—that at Leitrim—was £20. In all parts of Ireland under the new law the administration of justice had been most scandalous. It was no reflection upon the Irish character to say that, because the same changes in the law would lead to the same results anywhere else. Could anything but scandal result from the appointment of incompetent persons to discharge the duties of jurors? He would state a few instances of the evil operation of the present jury law in Ireland. A barrister of many years experience had written a letter to him stating that a juror who had been summoned to try an important criminal case at Nenagh, when he was about to be sworn said he could not read or write; and several others who had been summoned were equally incompetent. At Kilkenny one of the jurors in an important case, which had occupied the Court for a day, said to a barrister—"Could not your Honour get me let off, as I have been brought from a distance of 50 miles, and cannot read or write; nor do I understand a word of what is going on." At Clonmel a number of old men begged to be excused for similar reasons, and some of them had to pawn their coats and other garments in order to maintain themselves whilst they were in attendance as jurors. The Act, therefore, operated very hardly in the case of the poor man. In another place at the opening of a trial one of the jurors said that, on hearing a case the previous day, he thought the first counsel right until he heard his opponent, and then he did not know which was right. He wished to know whether the same thing would occur in the case then before them. The Judge and Mr. Butt informed the juror that he would have to hear both sides, and decide with which the truth lay. Thereupon the juror observed that he and his fellow jurors would decide according to their consciences, but that it was of no use making long speeches. [A laugh.] These cases had a ludicrous side, but they grievously affected the administration of justice. We could not afford to have the law brought into contempt in Ireland. At the Tipperary Assizes a man who had been sworn, and who could neither read nor write, was discharged by Chief Justice Whiteside because he had been appointed foreman of the jury. In one case, on a trial for murder, one of the jurymen was quite drunk, and another was a returned convict, who had served his seven years. In another case the Judge said the jury had forgotten the obligation of the oath they had taken, and, seeing that they gave a verdict of acquittal in spite of the evidence, he was obliged to infer that they were friends of the prisoner. It was evident that something should be done to remedy this state of things. He believed that all parties were anxious to obtain such a law as would ensure the attendance of jurymen who understood the nature of an oath, and would do their duty according to their oath, and who were competent by education to follow out the pleadings at trials. He thought the best means of obtaining that object would be by way of an inquiry before a Committee presided over by the noble Marquess the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and he rejoiced to think that such an inquiry need not take up more time than would be necessary to put a stop to the present disgraceful state of things. He thanked the House for having listened to the details he had brought forward, and concluded by moving for the Select Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act 34 and 35 Vic. c. 65, Juries (Ireland) Act, and whether it is necessary to amend the same in order to secure the due administration of justice,"—(Mr. Bruen),—instead thereof.

MR. HERON, while satisfied that the object of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) in bringing forward this subject was to secure the proper administration of the law, could not agree with him in his opinion that the result of the present system was lamentable and dangerous. The great object of the change in the law that had been effected by the Act in question had been to take away from the Sheriff the unlimited power he formerly had of selecting the jurymen at his own discretion. Nine Bills had been introduced at different times on this subject, and in 1858 Chief Justice Whiteside—then Mr. Whiteside—in introducing his Bill taking the discretion from the Sheriff, said the result would be to make partial juries impossible and to convert the Sheriff from a judicial into a Ministerial officer. He (Mr. Heron) believed that had been the result of the present Act of Parliament, and that the alteration was absolutely necessary, the state of the jury lists as returned by the different Sheriffs rendering it imperatively necessary there should be a change in the law. There was no doubt whatever that there had been a well-founded opinion in Ireland that trial by jury was not impartial. Under the old law there had been a constant struggle on the part of the Conservatives to have their causes tried by special juries, it being well known that the majority, if not the whole, of the special jurors were Conservatives and Protestants. At one time, when a man once got himself placed on the jury list it was impossible to remove him from it, and the consequence was that a number of persons made a regular profession of serving as jurors. The majority of those persons, of whom there were about 120 altogether in Dublin, were Conservative in politics and reduced in circumstances; they were well known, and during the sittings they never left the precincts of the Court, and the result was that they tried nearly the whole of the cases. He did not wish to say anything against a by-gone system; but he might mention that such jurors were known by the name of "guinea pigs." The power of the Sheriff in making out the jury panels was very large under the old system, as the Sheriff practically put any one he chose upon the panel, and in the case of John M'Kenna, a Roman Catholic, who was tried for the murder of a Protestant at the Monaghan Spring Assizes in 1869, the panel was challenged on the ground—in the old language of the law—that

That challenge was tried, and, the Sheriff being found guilty of partiality, the panel was quashed, the chief ground on which the decision was given being that scarcely any Roman Catholics were put on the panel, which was virtually composed of members of the Orange Lodges of Monaghan. The result was that all the prisoners for trial—120 in number—had to be let out on bail to the next Assizes, and yet, at the Summer Assizes, the Sheriff returned the very same panel. In the end the Government, acting on the advice of the then Attorney General (Mr. Sullivan) deprived the high Sheriff of his office, and in some of the cases for trial the venue was changed to adjacent counties. Evidence had also been given before the Select Committee which had been appointed to inquire into the alleged unlawful assemblies in Westmeath to the effect that sub-Sheriffs were frequently influenced in the selection of jurymen by the prisoner's attorney. It was evident, therefore, that before the passing of the Act in question the Sheriff or his deputy had power to show partiality in the selection of the jury panel. In the county of Cork better juries had never been returned than at the late Assizes, and there had not been a single failure of justice. The same remark applied to the county of Kerry. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, indeed, had said that on the Munster Circuit, gentlemen of property who had been summoned as jurors did not attend as was usual before farmers and persons of inferior position in society were called upon to attend in that capacity, but he hoped anything of that kind would never again occur. It should be borne in mind that the present system had been in existence for only one Assizes, and that many persons were summoned who, not having acted as jurors before, were probably somewhat awkward in a Court of Justice. One of the great advantages of the present system under the new law was that it brought landlords and tenants a great deal more into personal communication, and in that way was productive of considerable good. The hon. Member for Carlow had referred to a case in Nenagh in which a juror under the new system was found to be intoxicated. No doubt that juror was guilty of great misconduct, but the case did not stand entirely alone, for in every book of legal anecdotes numerous cases of that nature would be found to have happened in England and Ireland, as well as in Scotland. In another case that the hon. Member had referred to, where a juror had asked if he was to be influenced by the speeches of counsel, and the Judge had told him not to mind the lawyer's statements, but to find a verdict on the evidence, according to his conscience, he (Mr. Heron) believed that the jurymen had taken a most proper course in putting the question to the Court, and that such a jurymen would give an honourable and conscientious verdict. A great lawyer had stated that the system of serving as jurors in England had been one part of the education of the people of England, and it was now for the first time extended to the people of Ireland, instead of being confined to one privileged and limited class. He believed that, upon the whole, jurors had performed their duties impartially. No doubt there was one portion of the existing system which might be improved; he referred to the system of rating in some of the agricultural districts of Ireland. £15 householders in cities and towns were almost certain to be well qualified for jurors; but in some of the agricultural districts the present rating system needed alteration. He would add, in conclusion, that the Bill would, in his opinion, effect one of the objects which according to Lord Bacon ought to be one of the objects of a Court of Justice—it would satisfy the people that justice had been done—which could never be the case while they were excluded from being the judges of facts; for in Ireland there had been perpetual contests about the constitution of juries down to the time when Lord Denman had declared that, under certain circumstances, trial by jury must be regarded as “a delusion, a mockery, and a snare.” The present system might be capable of improvement, but he hoped that Parliament would never again intrust sub-Sheriffs with unlimited discretion to summon juries as they pleased; on the contrary, that every man would be summoned in turn, and that all, gentle and simple, would meet together in Courts of Justice.

MR. W. ORMSBY GORE said, nearly the whole of the remarks of the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken had been in condemnation of the Juries Law, as it existed prior to the passing of the late Act, but there was no doubt that the law was in a very bad state, and probably there was not one Member who would not sanction some reform of it; but that was no proof that the present law was efficient or satisfactory. He could corroborate most fully what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) with respect to the numerous failures of justice which had occurred throughout Ireland. The Grand Jury of the County of Leitrim, at the last Assizes, had expressed, he might add, an opinion to the effect that persons were summoned as jurors who were illiterate and unfit to perform their duties in that capacity. As an illustration he might mention the case of a man who had been tried for perjury, in which five jurors, after finding him “Guilty,” the next morning came to the Judge and said they had changed their minds, and they wished to find him “Not Guilty,” adding, at the same time, that they did not understand anything at all about it. Everybody else, however, had no doubt as to his guilt. All were of opinion that he richly deserved his sentence. There was another case, in which a man had been charged with robbery and the jury found him guilty of a common assault, which the Judge observed was the queerest name for robbery he had ever heard. He would simply add that there was a Bill before the House called the General Valuation Bill, the effect of which would be to raise the present rating of £15, which gave a qualification to serve as a juror, to £18, while £12 rating would be raised to £15, which would make other men, still more unfit, liable to serve in the future. That was a point which, in his opinion, ought to be referred to a Committee, which would sit to consider the merits of the case. He had much pleasure in supporting the Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was obliged to the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) for having brought the subject forward on an evening which was generally devoted to the Motions of private Members, although he, on the part of the Government, had announced it to be his intention to deal with it.

MR. BRUEN said, the Notice he had given to move for a Select Committee had been mentioned before the noble Marquess had stated that he meant to propose the appointment of a Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was aware that the Notice had been given a few minutes before he had announced the intentions of the Government; but the hon. Gentleman, knowing what those intentions were, made use of his influence with his Friends to withdraw the Motions which preceded his on the Papers. But be that as it might, his Order of Reference would limit the inquiry to the operation of the Act of 1871. Now, although he was willing to admit that that Act might require alteration, the Committee ought, he thought, to have power to investigate the jury system previous to its passing, and the principles upon which it ought,

if necessary, to be amended. He should therefore, propose to substitute for the terms of the Motion the words, "to inquire and report as to the working of the jury system in Ireland before and since the passing of the 34th Victoria, and whether any, and what, amendments should be made in that Act, with a view to the better administration of justice." The speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Heron) relieved him, he might add, from the necessity of saying on the subject a good deal which he might otherwise have thought it expedient to lay before the House. His hon. Friend had shown that a Committee of that House, consisting of men of the greatest weight and whose judgment was entitled to great respect—the late Sir James Graham being one of them—having inquired into the state of certain counties where outrages and crimes had been extremely frequent, gave it as their opinion that the Irish Jury Law was one of the matters which required amendment with reference to the disturbed condition of those counties. His hon. Friend had also shown from the evidence taken before the Westmeath Committee that, in the words of a most experienced authority on the subject, the state of the jury panel in that county was "perfectly frightful." He had also quoted the case of the county of Monaghan, where the grossest partiality on the part of the Sheriff and sub-Sheriff was proved, and the state of the jury panel to try party cases was such as could not be expected to give confidence to one of the parties concerned. Another proof of the unsatisfactory state of the former jury system was afforded in the county of Cavan, where a prisoner was tried three times for murder; the jury every time disagreed, and after the last trial an application was made for a change of venue to some other county. Several of the jurors would not find the prisoner guilty because they were apprehensive that if they did so they would suffer injury to their persons or property; and in that case Chief Justice Whiteside and Mr. Justice Fitzgerald did not deem the jury panel of the county of Cavan to be in a proper condition. The Act of 1871 sought to amend the Jury Law by the introduction of three principles—firstly, by substituting for the existing qualification—namely, a freehold and leasehold one—a rating qualification, secondly, by intrusting to the clerk of the union and the poor rate collector the preparation of the jury list; and thirdly—and most important of all—by taking away from the Sheriff, from the sub-Sheriff, or (as in some instances) from the sub-Sheriff's clerk, the discretion of choosing the panel, and making the Sheriff choose it impartially from a juror's book. Those three principles had all been admitted by every Government and every law officer who had attempted to amend the law on that subject on either side of the House. Since the Report of the Committee to which he had referred there had been no fewer than nine such attempts made, and the majority of these Bills contained the principle of practically terminating the Sheriff's discretion, and three of them—those introduced by Chief Justice Whiteside—took away all discretion from the Sheriff in selecting the jury panel. That appeared to him to be a most valuable and important part of the reform of the jury system effected by the Act of 1871, although the hon. Member for Carlow had devoted the greater portion of his speech to an attack upon that provision. It could not be admitted for a moment that any person, however high, should have the power of selecting, at his own discretion, the men who were to try cases affecting the lives and property of their fellow-subjects. It was extremely probable, so far as their limited experience of the Act of 1871 went, that the qualification had been too much reduced and would be required to be raised. That was a matter which would, of course, engage the attention of the Committee; but the Government had ample justification in the proposals of previous Governments for believing that the qualification they adopted in 1871 would be sufficient to secure a fit class of jurors. In the original Bill, Lord O'Hagan proposed a rating qualification of £30, subject to reduction when necessary. The proper limit appeared from the precedents of former Bills to be between £20 and £30. On the recommendation of the Dublin Chamber of Commerce—a body that took a considerable interest in the Irish Jury Law—the qualification was proposed to be reduced to £20 in the City and County of Dublin. In Committee on the Bill in the House of Lords, Lord O'Hagan proposed special qualifications in certain counties; in some a twofold qualification of £20 in towns and £30 in rural districts, in the remaining counties—except Leitrim—£20 in both towns and rural districts. The reason why a lower qualification had been adopted for Leitrim—namely, £15—was because with a higher qualification they would not have been able in so small a county to obtain a sufficient number of jurors to provide for a regular rotation, and the same jurors would have had to be called upon too frequently. Precisely the same principle was adopted in the Poor Law Act, and although the Act fixed the normal qualification of a guardian in Ireland at £30, yet that qualification existed in only 8 unions. It was £25 in 45 unions, £20 in 91, £15 in 17 unions or electoral divisions, and below that amount in 23. He did not deny that the Bill was passed through the House at a time when it was not easy to have complete discussion; or that with the assent of Mr. Baron Dowse, the qualification was reduced to £12 in towns, and £20 in rural districts; but the fact that the Bill passed through all its stages in July proved that it must have been generally assented to, because opposition must have been fatal to it at that period of the Session. Even supposing the cases brought forward had not been exaggerated, they could not be held to be conclusive as proving the failure of the measure, for the Act only came into operation this year, and it remained to be seen whether in the first panels the provisions of the Act with reference to the exclusion of incapacitated jurors had been complied with, or whether the right of challenge had been properly exercised by the Crown Solicitors. Assenting with willingness to the appointment of a Committee, he expressed the opinion that inquiry should be chiefly directed to two points—first, whether the qualification fixed by the Act of last year was a proper one, or whether it should be raised; and, second, whether there might not be a more complete revision of the jury lists before the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions. He trusted it would not be necessary—and he did not believe it would—to interfere with the really important part of the Bill, which secured perfect impartiality in the selection of the panels, and the removal of what he considered to be a very mischievous and improper power possessed by the Sheriff of selecting from particular panels of the jury lists; but of course it would be competent for the Committee to enter into a discussion of the whole question.

DR. BALL said, that whatever tended to throw light upon the subject would assist the House in framing a measure dealing with the jury law, and having seen some of the jurors under the new system he entertained no doubt that it was absolutely necessary to have a reform in the constitution of the panel. He did not see that there was any necessity for a more extended inquiry than that proposed by the noble Marquess, but no doubt it was indispensable to have that inquiry. He thought it was premature to anticipate the results of the inquiry by indicating any opinion upon any point to be investigated, and he much deprecated limiting the range of the inquiry by the Committee. He anticipated that the Committee would examine the Judges, the Law Officers, and the persons engaged in the administration of the law; and he thought that, until they had their evidence, it was premature to lay down that the jury was to be empanelled in any particular manner, or that there was to be any particular qualification. For his own part, he doubted whether a mere property qualification was sufficient, because he had heard a man who was on a special jury declare that he could neither read nor write. Surely, then, there must be some means of selection. It need not be exercised by the Sheriff; but unless regard was had to something beyond mere property qualification they might find that not one of the jury possessed sufficient intelligence for the trial of a case. He admitted that it was no objection against the Bill that it gave different qualifications, for the rating was not uniform in Ireland; but they would have to ascertain what would enable the administration of the law to be carried on by intelligent jurors. He protested against reference to Liberals or Conservatives in this matter. Such a topic as regarded the constitution of a jury was new to him, and, further, could not be a legal ground of objection. In a jury impanelled by ballot they might have a preponderance of men holding similar political opinions, but were they to suggest to the people that the decision of such a jury would be of no value?

God forbid that any idea should be sent abroad from this House that because a gentleman happened to be a Liberal or a Conservative he would not do his duty as a juror. It was not of the slightest consequence what were the politics or what was the religion of a juror; but he must be sufficiently intelligent to understand the legal terms brought into the discussion, the charge of the Judge, and the addresses of counsel. Recently it had been stated that at the trial for the Omagh murder, which lasted 10 days, and turned upon circumstantial evidence, the jury, after retiring, returned into Court to ask whether a man could be convicted of murder unless some one had seen the murder committed. That was not an instance of partizanship, but simply of want of intelligence. It was for the common interest to guard against such occurrences, and therefore he hoped that every means would be adopted by the Committee to ascertain what alterations in the law were necessary.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, it was at his instance that last year the qualification of jurors in towns was reduced from £20 to £12, because he had obtained Returns which convinced those in charge of the Bill that without such reduction it would in some instances be impossible to obtain a sufficient number of men to constitute a jury. It should be remembered that the reduction of the qualification was not made on the representation of any Member of the House, but on that of the Chamber of Commerce in Dublin. There was no question that the principle of the Act was right. The grand jury of Cork, of which body he was a member, were prepared before the Assizes commenced to pass a resolution condemnatory of the Act in the strongest terms, but having waited till they had experience of its working they passed a resolution merely to the effect that the Act required amendment; and Mr. Justice Fitzgerald in dismissing the panel said,—“I dismiss you, thanking you for your attendance and for the admirable manner in which you have found your verdicts.” He quite concurred with what had been stated to the effect that there should be a different qualification of jurors in different counties, but he thought the whole case would be met if the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions had power to strike off the list those who had not the means of attending the Assizes. It was all very well to cry out against a new system, but he believed that the present Act, amended in the direction he had intimated, would command the confidence of all classes in Ireland.

MR. BOURKE said, that as the Committee was to be granted, any discussion was a waste of time. He would suggest that the Order of Reference should be enlarged sufficiently to allow of evidence being given with regard to the desirability of having unanimity upon juries. That was a question as to which there was a strong opinion in Ireland, and, as he understood, the highest authorities with reference to the working of the jury system were ready to give their opinion upon it. They must beware lest in altering the qualifications very much they might exclude some of the best jurors.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, it was of great importance that there should not be such an extension of the Order of Reference as would interfere with an amendment of the jury law before the next Assizes.

COLONEL ANNESLEY said, he was glad that the Government had agreed to grant a Committee. The present state of the jury system in Ireland was simply scandalous. For the last 16 years he had acted as foreman of the grand jury of the county for which he sat (Cavan), and had therefore had some opportunities of becoming acquainted with the subject. Formerly convictions were very difficult to obtain; but now, startling as the statement might appear—murder, he believed, might be committed with impunity in some parts of Ireland. He had given the noble Marquess the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant notice that he would mention one case which he thought illustrated the operation of the present jury system. A small farmer in the county of Cavan seduced an unfortunate young woman, who was in the family way. She met him subsequently in a market town, and accompanied him into a field, where she was murdered by him, and her body partly hidden. The dreadful deed was witnessed by a man who was at the time in an adjoining field, and who gave evidence which left no doubt on the mind of the grand jury as to the guilt of the accused. The prisoner was tried at the next Assizes, and the same evidence was given, but the jury disagreed. Again, he was tried at the next Assizes with the same result, and at the last Assizes there was a third trial and a third disagreement. On inquiring what became of the murderer he was told that his passage had been paid to America by the Government, who had also given him a sum of money. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON said that was not true.] It was satisfactory to hear it denied; he could not believe the report, but it had been publicly stated in the grand jury room. Another case of brutal murder came before the same grand jury, respecting which no doubt could exist in any sane mind. A dispute having arisen between two neighbours respecting a quarter of an acre of bog, the one, who was partially blind, met the other, who was partially intoxicated, and stabbed him 18 times. Five of the wounds were mortal, and the accused having been seen grappling with the murdered man was apprehended shortly afterwards. His brother was taken with him, upon which he said, "He did not do it; what was done I did." Here was a positive confession in addition to eye witnesses of the act. The Judge who tried the case was Baron Dowse, who charged the jury to the effect that that was murder, and nothing else. The Judge charged them at five in in the evening, and the jury were locked up till ten o'clock next morning, and then they were discharged. What more monstrous failure of justice could be conceived? The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) said the people of Ireland had confidence in the Act. That opinion did not coincide with his experience. He had still one other case. An ex-policeman who had been active in apprehending Fenians was followed by two rough men from a market, one of whom felled him with a club by a blow sufficient to fell an ox. The ex-policeman was taken to the hospital, and died in three days. There were eye-witnesses to that act also, but the jury would not convict for murder, and the matter was compromised by a verdict of manslaughter. The case ended by a severe sentence of penal servitude. Certainly, these cases showed that the law could not be administered in Ireland to the satisfaction of the country.

Mr. BRUEN said, that as the noble Marquess the Chief Secretary for Ireland proposed a new form of inquiry for the Committee, it only remained for him to withdraw his Motion, and in doing so to express his thanks to the hon. Members who had kindly enabled him to bring the matter before the House.

COLONEL STUART KNOX regretted the Reference had been extended. It would now be impossible to legislate this year, and murder, robbery, and other crimes would go unpunished in Ireland till next Session. He protested against a country being left in the dreadful state in which Ireland was at present. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) might say everybody was satisfied in Ireland, but the fact was none were satisfied but criminals.

SIR JOHN ESMONDE protested against the number of jurors in Ireland being diminished.

ALDERNEY (HARBOUR AND FORTIFICATIONS).

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Select Committee in last Session on the works in Alderney, and to move for any Minute or Report which will explain the intentions of the Government in regard to the maintenance of those works.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX rose and said, he had to make an appeal to his noble Friend. The Committee, of which the noble Duke was Chairman, had only made their Report last Session, and it was impossible that anything could have been done to the works without a Vote. The views of the Government did not, perhaps, differ very much from those expressed in the Report of the Committee; but they had not had sufficient time to go into the subject so thoroughly as to enable them to make any proposal in the Estimates for the present year. More than that—they understood that during the winter considerable injury had been done to the Breakwater. It was essential, therefore, that there should be an examination of the actual state of the Breakwater, and with that view Mr. Hawkshaw and Lieutenant Colonel A. Clarke, the two engineers who had examined the works, were about to again visit Alderney—they would go over during the Easter vacation. He hoped, therefore, his noble Friend would be good enough to postpone his Motion till after Easter. It was important to his noble Friend himself that he should be put in possession of the latest information as to the state of the Breakwater, and if he postponed his Motion the Government at the earliest possible period after Easter would state what their intentions were as regarded the subject of his noble Friend's Notice.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he did not wish to press his Motion against the views of Her Majesty's Government, and therefore would accede to his noble Friend's request, but with the clear understanding that after Easter he (Viscount Halifax), or some other Member of the Government, would state what course it meant to pursue. Of course, it would be competent for him to make any Motion he might think it advisable to submit to their Lordships after he had heard what the Government proposed to do.

NAVY—H.M.S. THE "DEVASTATION."

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, that in rising to put some inquiries on the subject of Her Majesty's ship Devastation, he must remind their Lordships that his Questions had been on the Notice Paper upwards of six weeks, and that he had postponed the matter at the request of his noble Friend the Earl of Camperdown, until after the First Lord of the Admiralty should have made his official statement to the other House in moving the Navy Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman had now made a very clear and straightforward statement, showing the state of the Navy generally; but when touching on professional points he said he did not so much speak for himself as repeat the opinions of his professional advisers and of scientific men; consequently, it was to those professional men and philosophers any observations which he (the Earl of Lauderdale) had now to make would be mainly directed. The Devastation was one of four vessels of the same class and character—the others being the Thunderer, the Fury, and another. Those vessels were intended to be sea-going ships, and the question to be determined was whether they really were safe-going vessels. They had no masts, and there had never before been ships of war with such a low freeboard and such a high centre of gravity. He considered these to be most dangerous features in such vessels, and it was necessary that there should be a trial of the Devastation as soon as possible—and all the more necessary because it had been found necessary to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of the serious loss of merchant vessels, much of which was attributed to low freeboards. Why were the Devastation and the Thunderer and the two other vessels of the same class to have a low freeboard and a high centre of gravity? The reason assigned was that those qualities were supposed to give a steady platform, so that the fire of the guns would not be thrown away. In passenger ships a low freeboard and a high centre of gravity were believed to contribute to the comfort of the stomachs of those on board. In a ship-of-war a steady platform was exceedingly desirable—it was indeed a requisite; but that object, however valuable, must not be obtained at the sacrifice of the safety of the ship and her crew. Now, up to the present time there was nothing but theory to show that those low freeboards were safe. He thought, however, the public would not be satisfied to go on theory alone—we wanted experiment. When guns of a new kind were constructed they were subjected to the utmost trial—they were tried till they burst. He did not go to the length of saying a ship ought to be tried until she was destroyed, but he did think that she ought to be tried until it became apparent that it would not be safe to try her further. The First Lord of the Admiralty said that Department would look on the Devastation as a trial vessel. Well, if she was really to be tried against a heavy sea, the sooner that was done the better. For himself, he had no objection to the building of one such ship as the Devastation; but as an experiment, because he was not at all satisfied that vessels of that class would prove to be good sea-going ships. He found that some authorities denied that the Devastation was a vessel of low freeboard, and asserted that she had a foot and a half more freeboard than certain passenger vessels. What were the facts? She had 9 feet out of the water forward, and 4 feet 6 inches aft. He had never heard of a passenger ship with such a low freeboard as that. The Serapis was 22 feet out of the water forward, and 16 feet aft. The Thunderer had been round by Plymouth and Portsmouth recently, when she was going 12 knots. He thought the sea must have been nearly smooth then; but as the vessel was going at 12 knots, and in a cross sea, that would make a great wind. He thought there was some miscalculation as to the actual wind blowing in the Channel; but at all events the experiment with the Thunderer could not be regarded as one which settled the question of low freeboards. It was said that the Devastation could not be capsized because she had no sails, but ships with sails were not capsized till the sails were blown away. The Devastation had a great hurricane-house, and the danger of her capsizing would probably arise, if it arose at all, from the sea acting on that and as it were getting under the eaves of it. One question which ought at once to be settled was whether the Devastation was a high freeboard or a low one. His own opinion was that she was a low freeboard. Was Her Majesty's Government satisfied that such a vessel as this would be safe at sea and able to live in a gale? The professional advisers of the First Lord were of opinion that she was fit to go to any part of the world; but he had his doubts on that point. He was satisfied of this—that if every vessel in the British Navy were to be cut down to the same freeboard as the Devastation, there would not be one of them but would be unseaworthy. The Monarch turret-ship was 24 feet over water at the bows; the Sultan was 31 feet, and the Royal Sovereign 10 feet, and she was not a good sea-going vessel. The Blazer gunboat, which was not much larger than a ship's launch, was 9 feet. What the performance at sea of vessels of the Devastation class would be, was a very serious matter; and in order to solve it as little delay as possible should be allowed to intervene before there was a trial. He did not want the vessel to be taken to sea in a gale of wind, but he thought that she ought to be taken down the Channel at four or five knots. If it was found that there was no danger at that speed, she might be taken a little further, and got into the trough of the sea; and if she answered so far, she might be taken out to sea until the officers on board did not think fit to go any further; or let her be taken to Bantry Bay in company with the Monarch, or some other of Her Majesty's sea-going ships—let her wait until a gale came, and after the gale had blown itself out let her go out and see how she would behave herself in the heavy swell that would follow. He believed that could be done without danger, and it was the only effectual and satisfactory mode of dealing with such a vessel as the Devastation. Thirty years ago he served on a Committee for Harbour Defences—the Committee had a good adviser in Mr. Scott Russell—that Committee contemplated the building of vessels of freeboard, but at the time they were intended for harbour defence, and not for sea-going ships. There were seas 20 feet, 30 feet, 40 feet, and 50 feet high. Admiral Fitzroy was not prepared to say that there were not seas even 60 feet high; but let them take a sea 30 feet high, and how would the captain force such a ship as the Devastation off a lee shore? He agreed it was quite right to build the Devastation as a trial ship; but three more of these vessels had been built at a cost of £2,000,000, and yet no proper test of their safety had as yet been made. He begged to ask, If the "Devastation" is to be inclined in order to ascertain her stability at various angles; and as to what trials are to be made at sea in order to ascertain her efficiency and safety as a sea-going vessel in bad weather such as a sea-going vessel was liable to encounter at all seasons?

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN hoped his noble Friend would excuse him if he did not occupy their Lordships' time by entering into the comparative merits of broadside iron ships, turret ships with high freeboard, and turret ships with low freeboard. Each of these classes had its advocates, and as they were able men he could not pretend to say how long the discussion might not be maintained. In reference to the Question itself, he had to thank his noble Friend (the Earl of Lauderdale) for having acceded to his request for a postponement of his Questions till after the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty in "another place," and he thought their Lordships had the advantage of a very clear and able statement. He thought that when a new class of ship was introduced into the Navy, it was both right and proper that the first official statement respecting it should be made by that Member of the Government who, more than any other person, was responsible to Parliament and the country for the ships built under the direction of the Board of Admiralty. With reference to the observation of his noble Friend as to the First Lord having in the matter of ships of the Devastation class acted on the advice of professional advisers and men of science—whom his noble Friend was pleased to term "philosophers"—he thought it right to remind him that among those professional advisers and scientific men were naval officers of the highest experience, including Controllers like Sir Spencer Robinson and Admiral Stewart; and those ships had been designed not only on the advice of professional advisers, but also on that of the Committee, who examined and considered designs submitted to the First Lord. He found that on the 24th of March, 1869, the following gentlemen, especially invited by the First Lord, assembled at the Admiralty:—Admiral the Earl of Lauderdale, Rear Admiral H. R. Yelverton, Captain Cowper Coles, Mr. William Fairbairn, Mr. Joseph Whitworth, and Dr. Woolley; and that there were also present besides all the members of the Board of Admiralty, Rear Admiral Key and Mr. E. J. Reed, at that time Chief Constructor of the Navy. A design was submitted, and the First Lord taking a note of the principal and important features of that design, invited a discussion upon each of these seriatim. They were considered to be—1, low freeboard; 2, draught of water with special reference to twin screws; 3, the absence of masts; and, 4th, the nature of the armaments. He believed that 8 feet 9 inches forward and 4 feet 6 inches aft was the freeboard in the design approved, not only by that Committee, but also by the Committee presided over by Lord Dufferin. It was then believed that ships of the Devastation class would prove first-class fighting ships; and, notwithstanding the doubts expressed by his noble Friend to the contrary, it would, perhaps, be a proof to the House and the country that in the minds of experienced officers there was great confidence in those vessels, if he mentioned that Admiral Stewart was prepared to take a passage in the Devastation on her trial trip, and that Mr. Barnaby, the Chief Naval Architect, had asked permission to be on board during the trial. As to the force of the wind on the occasion when the sister ship of the Devastation, the Thunderer, made her trip, he thought it was not likely there had been any miscalculation as to the wind, Admiral Stewart being on board; but, even granting that there had been such a mistake, and the force of wind was not so great as had been stated, still the result showed that the Thunderer made better way against a head sea than the Valorous. Some curiosity had been expressed to know why, when the Devastation had been tried so long ago as October last, no further trial of her had been made since that time. The trial in October was one for her engines, and with a view to deciding on the engines for other vessels, it was desirable the experiments should be made at the earliest possible period. If his right hon. Friend the First Lord, when making his statement on the Navy Estimates, and if he himself now spoke with caution respecting the Devastation, it was not that they, or that the advisers of the Admiralty had any reason to question her safety or stability as a sea-going ship, but because they had not yet had any experience of the Devastation's sea-going powers; and, until they had satisfactory evidence on the subject from experience, they would not say that she was in that respect a satisfactory ship. At the same time everything approaching a trial that she or the Thunderer had undergone had been in the direction of success, and the First Lord had no ground for supposing, from what his professional advisers said, that there was the least reason to question her safety or stability. The reason there had been no trial since October was that it had not been thought desirable to make a further trial until her fittings were complete. They would be complete in a few days, and then she would be subjected to a different trial from that which she had undergone to test the power of her engines. That was not the sort of trial contemplated by his noble Friend; but there would be a series of progressive trials such as he had spoken of in order that the sea-going qualities of the Devastation might be fully tested. The Admiralty were quite aware of the responsibility which the invention of a new class of ship entailed upon them. They were perfectly aware that the Devastation was an experimental ship, and while they did not in the least distrust her, they felt that every precaution must be taken in conducting these trials so as not to endanger the lives of those who were on board. His noble Friend, however, rather overstated the case in mentioning that her freeboard was so very low. Perhaps, it had escaped his recollection that since she was originally designed her superstructure had been increased, the effect of which had been to raise very materially the height of her freeboard, and, therefore, to increase her stability. [The Earl of LAUDERDALE: That is amidst ships. My figures are fore and aft.] Originally, she was designed for 50 feet of her length forward with a freeboard of 8 feet 9 inches; and for the remaining 234 feet of her length with a freeboard of 4 feet 6 inches. Now, by the alterations made, for the first 60 feet of her length she has a freeboard of 8 feet 9 inches, as originally proposed; for the next 184 feet she has a freeboard of 10 feet 9 inches; and only for the last 50 feet has she a freeboard of 4 feet 6 inches. In this way the range of her stability had been increased from 43 degrees, as originally designed, to 55½ degrees. The ship had been inclined some time ago, and the inclination showed the result he had just mentioned. Within the last few days she had been inclined a second time. The calculations had not yet been worked out; but he should be glad to let his noble Friend have them when they were completed. Having now given what he thought was a complete answer to the question, he would only repeat a hope that it would not be supposed that the Admiralty were running anything which could properly be called a risk with respect to this new class of ship. Of course, every new type of vessel was necessarily an experiment, possessing qualities which could only be tested by actual trial. All the Admiralty could do was to take every precaution, and see that no risk was run, and that the officers in charge were persons in whom the country and the service placed confidence. He was sure his noble Friend would agree with him that no fitter person could have been chosen, and no one in whom the ship's company would have greater confidence than Captain Hewitt, to whom the command of the Devastation had been given.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET wished to say a few words on this matter. This was an experimental ship, and for the last seven or eight years a great deal had been heard in the House of Commons as to the necessity of fixing the responsibility for every ship that was built. Now, he wanted to show their Lordships the position at which we had arrived with regard to the responsibility for this experimental ship, the Devastation. The vessel was designed by Mr. Reed, and the drawings were at the Dockyard, but when he left the Admiralty the stem had only just been laid down. As, however, he was very anxious that justice should be done to the ship, he offered to give his services gratuitously in order that the vessel might be built according to his design;—and, of course, in planning so complicated a structure a great deal must be still in the designer's mind, without being reduced to paper. Mr. Reed's offer was refused. He was told that he was not wanted, and that the Constructing Committee at the Admiralty could build the vessel without his assistance. He left the Admiralty, and the Constructing Committee began their work; but before they had gone far the Admiralty appointed another Committee—Lord Dufferin's Committee, as it was called. They sat in the Board Room at the Admiralty, took evidence, and recommended what they thought right, superseding both Mr. Reed and the Constructing Committee. But, after discussing the question they were divided in opinion—one section desiring that the ship should be constructed in one way, and the other in another way. Their Report, therefore, was not a very satisfactory one. The Devastation was talked of as a fighting ship; but what did the Committee themselves say in their Report of July 26, 1871?—

"Persons whose opinions are entitled to weight have expressed their conviction that it will be impossible for these ships to be forced head to sea without being smothered. This is a point which cannot be decided in any other way than by actual trial."

So that, according to the Committee, until we had smothered the Devastation we could not know whether it was in danger of being smothered. Well, after this the Admiralty took the ship in hand. But Mr. Goschen could not be fixed with the responsibility—he could not set aside the Report of a Committee sitting in the Board Room of the Admiralty; nor could the Constructing Committee accept the responsibility, because they had been superseded by another Committee. Thus, if the Devastation should meet with the fate of the Captain, we should be in the same position now as we were then, and should not know where to fix responsibility. It was clear that under such a system no one could be responsible for ships that were built. His noble Friend (the Earl of Lauderdale) talked of the responsibility of the Admiralty; but it was not fair to fix the responsibility on Mr. Goschen. He had asked, in their Lordships' Committee, Admiral Robinson who would be responsible for the Devastation when completed, and Admiral Robinson said that he could not tell; that the Constructing Committee had departed from his recommendation, and therefore he could not be responsible any more than Mr. Reed could be. Thus the responsibility was shifted from one to another, and it was now impossible to say who was responsible for this ship. Such a state of things was most unsatisfactory.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, the experience of his noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) at the Admiralty must surely have taught him that when experimental ships were being built it was the duty of the First Lord to take the best advice he could during the whole time of their construction; and this was not less the case when a considerable time elapsed before the vessel was sent to sea. There could not, however, be the slightest doubt who was responsible when such a vessel actually went to sea. It was the Board of Admiralty, at the time of her being sent to sea, and the Constructor upon whose official responsibility the final arrangements of the vessel were determined. In this case, no doubt, there had been alterations of construction since Mr. Reed laid the first lines of the Devastation. The ultimate responsibility lay with the Admiralty, whose present adviser was Mr. Barnaby. So far as Constructors were responsible, he was responsible for the ship as she stood at this moment. All authorities concurred in the necessity of having ships with a much lower freeboard than was formerly the case when they were not armour-plated. The reason was that if the height of ships out of the water was as great as that of the old class of ships it would be impossible they could carry the armour-plating which was necessary to make them efficient engines of war. The scientific men and the naval men who were consulted concurred in believing that the Devastation was the type of the fighting ship of the future. It was impossible, however, to establish the soundness of a theory without ample experiment. Theory went a long way, but experience went further. His right hon. Friend Mr. Goschen was proceeding in the matter with great care, while recognizing fully the fact that the Devastation must be tried under all those conditions which, as a sea-going ship, she must be prepared to meet. So far as her engines were concerned, she would be tried directly, and if that trial was satisfactory she would proceed to sea at once. In a very few days, therefore, an opportunity would be given for testing, as his noble Friend had pointed out, the sea-going capabilities of this ship.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, that though there were not only scientific and philosophical and the best known men on Lord Dufferin's Committee, there was not a single naval architect, according to the best of his knowledge, who was accustomed to build iron ships of that size. The principle adopted was far away from the principle of no freeboard, and if the principle of no freeboard had been adopted, the water would have simply washed over the vessel and she would have been steady. It was easy to explain why the Thunderer had sailed 12 knots in rough weather, when she was going to Portsmouth the other day, accompanied by the Valorous. He believed the Valorous had only 2,000 tons weight, whereas the Thunderer had 10,000 tons, so that if they were caught in a chopping sea, the weight and length of the Thunderer would cause her to go very smoothly ahead, which the Valorous with her lighter weight could not do. His noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) had reminded him that he was on the Committee which recommended the building of this ship. Now, he certainly was on that Committee, and he had stated so before to the House. When the papers were laid before him first of all, and his opinion was asked whether a ship of that type would be serviceable, he asked if she was intended to be a regular sea-going ship and to do the business of the country wherever wanted; and the reply being in the affirmative, he said that he did not think she would do, or that she would be safe. Another member, Mr. Fairbairn, one of the Naval Architects, to whom the question was also put, said that he could give no other answer than that given by the Earl of Lauderdale. In the course of the discussion he (the Earl of Lauderdale) said there was no use arguing this point, and as some said she would be fit for anything, and as others said she would not, and as there was only one way of deciding the question, the thing to be done was to build one ship and try her; and under those circumstances he would give his approval to the building of one vessel. That was a very different thing from advocating the building of four such vessels for the Navy. But while saying she would not be fit for sea-going service, he had admitted she would be one of the most powerful vessels in the Navy, and would do for coast defence; but the drawback even there would be that she drew too much water. He certainly could not be described as one who had advocated the Devastation class of ships before the principle had been tried.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that the remarks which the noble Earl had just addressed to their Lordships would illustrate the difficulties in which the Admiralty was sometimes placed. The noble Earl had told them that he was for building one ship of the Devasta- tion class, and one only; but last autumn their Lordships would have seen every kind of advice given to the Admiralty through the medium of the public journals. If there were eminent naval officers who advocated the building of one ship of the Devastation type only, there were persons equally eminent who advised the Admiralty to build a squadron of Devastations. The Admiralty were then told they had no gunboats, and that they ought to build squadrons of gunboats. They were also told that they had no frigates, and that they ought to build squadrons of frigates. He was glad therefore to find that there were in naval circles officers like his noble Friend who thought the Admiralty sometimes did too much in the way of shipbuilding.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 31st March, 1873.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Juries (Ireland), appointed.

SUPPLY—Resolution [March 28] reported.

Ordered—First Reading—Building Societies * [109]; Gretton Chapel Marriages Legalization * [110].

Second Reading—Matrimonial Causes Acts Amendment * [101]; East India Stock Dividend Redemption * [102]; East India Loan * [103]; Metropolitan Commons Supplemental * [107].

Committee—Railway and Canal Traffic [121]—in p.

Committee—Report—Marine Mutiny *; Sites for Places of Religious Worship * [25].

Third Reading—Mutiny; Income Tax Assessment * [28]; Turks and Caicos Islands * [87]; Public Worship Facilities * [100], and passed.

THE "MURILLO."—QUESTION.

MR. T. E. SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any further progress has been made in the investigation in Cadiz into the charges against the captain and officers of the "Murillo;" whether the "Murillo" is still under arrest; and when the Correspondence thereon will be laid upon the Table?

The Earl of Camperdown

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the case of the Murillo is still pending before the Spanish Tribunal, and the vessel, according to the latest intelligence received at the Foreign Office, is still under detention at Cadiz. It is not usual to present to Parliament correspondence relating to a case which may be pending between two Governments until the correspondence is completed, and the correspondence relating to this case being still pending with the Spanish Government, it would not be right to present the Papers in an incomplete form. I may add, in justice to the Spanish authorities at Madrid, that they have shown every disposition to assist in arriving at the truth and in elucidating the facts of the case.

SUEZ CANAL—SHIPPING TOLLS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to the fact that the "Liberté" of March 27th, publishes a letter written by M. Barthelemy St. Hilaire to M. de Lesseps, warmly congratulating him in the name of M. Thiers on the verdict by the Suez Canal Company against the Messageries Maritimes, M. Thiers warmly agrees with the views of the Company on the tonnage question, and promised to speak to Lord Lyons in this sense, and will otherwise support the Company as far as possible; and what instructions have been sent to Lord Lyons on this important subject?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: The letter, Sir, in question is dated the 14th instant. On the 17th, Her Majesty's Government learnt from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople that M. de Lesseps had announced that he had received such a communication. Instructions were sent the same evening to Lord Lyons, directing him to ascertain without loss of time whether M. de Lesseps was justified in using M. Thiers's name in insisting at Constantinople upon the pretensions of the Canal Company. Lord Lyons saw M. de Rémusat on the following day, who, in reply to his inquiry, said that certainly M. de Lesseps had not any official authority to use M. Thiers's name in the matter. In forwarding an extract from the Liberté on the 28th instant containing this letter, Lord Lyons, referring to the mention of his name in it, says—

"Nothing of the kind has ever been said to me by the President of the Republic."

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH ACT, 1869—COMPENSATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. FOWLER asked the Postmaster General, What progress has been made in the settlement of the amounts still payable to Railway Companies as compensation under the Telegraph Act, 1869; and, whether he can state what was the estimated amount of such compensation?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, the Post Office has already concluded arrangements with 40 railway companies, who possess the greater part of the railways of the United Kingdom. Arbitration is going on with 10 or 11 railway companies; but it is impossible to say when the arrangements with the remainder of the railway companies will be completed, or what sum arbitrators will award to them.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION—PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.—QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON (for Mr. O'REILLY) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would state to how many of the Public Departments in the Schedule to the Orders in Council on the subject of examination the Treasury claim the right by Act of Parliament to appoint without conforming to the regulations of the Order in Council?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Treasury and all other Departments to whom full powers of appointment were granted by Act of Parliament possessed the right alluded to in the question. He could not enumerate those Departments. But if it were meant to ask, whether it was the intention of the Treasury to exercise that right, he begged to say it had no such intention.

CIVIL SERVICE (IRELAND)—REPORTS OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON (for Mr. O'REILLY) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reference to an answer of his on Monday, Whether the Reports of the Commissioners appointed last year to inquire into the case of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, the Irish Constabulary, and certain other branches of the Civil Service in Ireland, the last of which was signed by the Commissioners on the 14th December, were received at the Treasury on the following dates:—The Report and Evidence on the Dublin Metropolitan Police on the 19th December, that on the Constabulary and Resident Magistrates on the 24th January, and the other Reports in the first week of February; and, whether he can explain the delay in their regard?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Reports alluded to were received at the Treasury at the dates given in the Question, except the last, which was received in the second, not the first, week of February. Three of the Reports had been referred to the Irish Government, and the last would be so referred. The Irish Government had not yet arrived at a decision with respect to them, and undoubtedly a considerable time must be allowed for consideration, seeing that the matters involved were of so much importance. In the meantime a certain provisional improvement had been made in the pay of the Irish Constabulary and the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

NAVY—SYSTEM OF NAVIGATION.
QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he intends to take any steps for giving the general body of the executive Officers of the Navy facilities for obtaining knowledge and experience in practical navigation, pilotage, and surveying duties, and for afterwards utilising the experience so gained; and, whether he will state what alterations he proposes to make generally in the system under which Her Majesty's Ships are at present navigated?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, his broad answer was that it was not proposed to make any organic change in the system under which Her Majesty's ships were at present navigated, or to abolish the class of navigating officers. With regard to the more detailed Question as to the instruction of Her Majesty's officers in pilotage, surveying, and practical navigation, it would require too lengthened a statement to admit of his going into the subject at present. He would endeavour to give the hon. Gentleman the information to which he was entitled in the course of the discussion on the Navy Estimates.

THE FIJI ISLANDS—CONSUL MARCH.

QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any request has been received by Her Majesty's Government from the Government of the Fiji Islands for the removal of Consul March?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, a communication has been received from the Fijian authorities requesting the removal of Mr. Consul March; but before the receipt of that communication Lord Granville had already decided that, in the interests of the public service, it would be desirable, looking to the altered state of things in the Fijis, brought about by the establishment of a quasi-regular form of Government, that Mr. Consul March should be transferred to another post. This determination was come to, not on account of any misconduct on the part of Mr. Consul March, or disapproval of his proceedings, but solely from a conviction that the relative positions of the Consul, and of those who administered the newly-established Government of the Fijis had become so altered that in the interests of both parties a change was required.

SUGAR DUTIES—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE, 1864.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether France has complied with the arrangement entered into at the recent Conference, that each of the Four Powers which were parties to the International Convention of 1864, should study the question of chemical analysis as applied to the assessment of the Sugar Duty, with the view of ascertaining whether science will furnish, as a corrective of the imperfections of the system of assessment by colour, some quicker and more practical processes than the various methods of saccharimetry at present adopted by one part of the European sugar trade?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government had received no communication from the French Government on the subject.

IRELAND—THE RIVER SHANNON.

QUESTION.

MAJOR TRENCH asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the urgency of the case, he will, on the earliest opportunity, bring in a Bill for improving the Drainage and Navigation of the River Shannon, and enabling those interested in the former to co-operate with the Government in effecting this purpose?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, as to the navigation of the River Shannon, he was not aware that anything was required to be done. As far as the drainage went, he had considered the question very carefully, and he was sorry to say he did not think it advisable to introduce a Bill on the subject.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, 1873.—QUESTIONS.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, if the Time Table, which the Inspector sees at his annual visit, shows what extra subject is intended to be taught, the six months' notice required by the New Code, 1873, page 32, will be satisfied; or, whether in all cases an outline of the course of instruction similar to those suggested in the Fourth Schedule must be sent to the Inspector six months before the annual examination?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the requirements of the Code would be satisfied if the Time Table, and the outline of the course of instruction were shown to the Inspector.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked, If it is true that the Education Department has decided that united school districts formed under Clauses 40, 41, and 43 of the Education Act of 1870 are not entitled to the formation in them of School Boards without inquiry upon application, as provided in Clause 12, sub-sec. (1); and, if so, how this decision can be reconciled with the following words, which occur in Sec. 40:—

"A united school district shall, for all the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be a school district, and shall throughout this Act be deemed to be substituted for the school districts out of which it is constituted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the Education Department was informed by its legal advisers that under Clauses 40, 41, and 43, no new school district could be formed without inquiry, and also that the provisions of Section 12, sub-section 1, did not apply to the formation of a school district. With regard to the words quoted by his noble Friend, they applied to a select district after it had been formed and not before.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL.

(Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Childers, Mr. Arthur Peel.)

[BILL 34.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said it might be convenient that he should make a short statement which would enable the House to understand exactly how he meant to deal with one or two Amendments which had been put on the Paper. He referred specially to two Amendments which came from both sides of the House in regard to Clause 5. One Amendment proposed to admit the concluding words of the clause from "notwithstanding" to "Act" inclusive. He found that these words had created a degree of alarm, he was going to say in the public mind, but he should rather say in the railway mind, much beyond anything he had himself anticipated. His main object in introducing these words was to make sure that the intention of the Joint Committee of last Session with regard to facilities and through rates should be carried into effect—"through rates" being declared "facilities" within the meaning of the Traffic Act. But he had learnt that these words were understood to cover a much larger field than he admitted was necessary for the purpose of the Joint Committee or of this Bill; and, that being the case, he was very willing to omit them from the clause. His desire was to carry faithfully into effect the recommendations of the Joint Committee of last year; and all the more so because that Committee did him the honour to support and accept the Report which, as their Chairman, he had submitted for their approval. The words as they now stood in the clause, he willingly admitted, went beyond any recommendation of the Joint Committee, because they applied to the whole Railway and Canal Traffic

Act, but much might be said in favour of the words, for they all knew very well that from the imperfection of the system of Private Bill legislation the general legislation of this country had, he was afraid, in not a few instances, been over-riden and contradicted by clauses which had been introduced into private Acts of Parliament entirely, so to speak, behind the back of the public. At the same time, it was difficult to pronounce with accuracy as to what the words to which he had referred might cover and include, and that was in itself a reason against their retention in the clause. He should, therefore, be ready to accept the Amendment on the Paper with respect to the omission of the words from the end of the 5th clause. The only other Amendment to which he need refer was an important one put on the Paper by one of the hon. Members for South-West Lancashire (Mr. Cross), who was a leading member of the Joint Committee last year. He (Mr. Fortescue) should be able to accept his proviso on Clause 5, at least in great part, as he understood it. There would be some difficulty about the latter words, but as to the former part of the proviso, there was no difficulty in accepting it with a slight alteration. It might be necessary in Clause 10—the Through Rates Clause—to insert words which would make the meaning perfectly clear, because he never concealed from the House what the intention of the Joint Committee was in that clause—that in certain cases through rates should be compulsory, and that where the Parliamentary powers of charge were found by the Parliamentary Commissioners to be used not bona fide for the purpose of forwarding traffic, but to send it by another route for the private interest of the Company and against the interest of the public, the Parliamentary powers should not be allowed to stand in the way. The clause might, indeed, act of itself in the way intended, but it was better to be entirely clear on these matters, and a few words might be added to Clause 10 for the purpose of making it clear that the power of ordering through rates, limited as it would be by various provisions in the clause, should not be defeated by mere reference to the Parliamentary powers of charge. In conclusion, he ventured to appeal to both sides of the House not to waste time by a long preliminary discussion. An hon. Member had given Notice of his intention to move an Amendment to the Motion for going into Committee, but as the Bill had not the slightest shadow of a party character, he hoped the feeling of the House would be in favour of going into Committee, and endeavouring to make some effectual progress to-night.

MR. J. FIELDEN said, that he was unavoidably absent from the debate on the second reading; but if the question which he wished to put before the House had been discussed, he would not have felt it his duty to propose, as he now did, that the House should go into Committee upon the Bill this day six months. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) had to a certain extent protested against the Bill, but he had not raised the question of principle. Now what was the principle of the Bill? The principle of this Bill was, that whereas in the past all the rules, regulations, and restrictions imposed upon railways had been contained in Acts of Parliament, it was now proposed by this Bill to abandon this system, and to give power to three Commissioners to make laws for the government of all the railway interests in this country. This was a vital principle which was not touched upon on the second reading, and which ought to be carefully and seriously discussed by the House. The railway interest was a gigantic interest, and he thought it would be a dangerous thing to give to three Commissioners power to deal at will with 500 or 600 millions of property. If such vital and important interests were to be subjected to what would in effect be arbitrary power, he did not see how the liberties of the country were to be preserved. There was an idea abroad that this Commission was to deal with every question in reference to railways. There were people who thought that if this Bill passed every one who arrived at a junction belonging to two Railway Companies and did not find a train to carry him forward might make a complaint to these Commissioners and get redress. But the Bill did not provide for anything of the sort, it simply provided that these three Commissioners should carry out the

President of the this. Were these down arbitrary

rules riding over the whole management of railways? Or were they to act strictly within the law? If they were to act within the law, why should not the Court of Common Pleas carry out the provisions just as well, and why had it not carried out the Act of 1854? The reason was that the complaints were frivolous, and not such as ought to be dealt with by such a tribunal, and surely it could not be tolerated that anyone who had some frivolous complaint should insist on a Court of Law interfering to disturb the traffic on railways. What had the Railway Companies done that they were to be dealt with in this arbitrary manner? Had they neglected their duty to the public? Had they not done what was reasonably expected of them, and conferred an immense benefit on the community? He found that there was a prevalent idea in the House that he was a railway director. He was a Proprietor of stock in many railways, but he was not a railway director. And he could say further that before he gave Notice of this Motion he had not had a communication with any railway directors or any railway official. He was acting on the present occasion solely from considerations of public policy, and he believed—and he hoped that the House would believe him when he said it—that he was not the man to be put forward to do the work of any Board of Railway Directors. It seemed to him that this Bill amounted to a breach of faith, because the proprietors of railways had invested their money on the faith of Acts of Parliament, after knowing that they were liable to have those Acts altered solely and only when Parliament deemed it right in the interest of the public that these Acts should be modified. But they did not invest their money on the understanding or in the belief that this vast property which was held by railway proprietors, should be handed over to three Commissioners appointed by Ministers of the day. The Standing Order of the House, No. 168, not only defined that railway proprietors invested their money under a clause of an Act of Parliament, but by inference it implied that nothing but an Act of Parliament could alter the conditions. His contention was that this Bill gave power to three Commissioners to interfere and to take action with regard to the property of railway proprietors without an Act of Parliament. He wanted to show to the House that railway proprietors had not been negligent of the interest of the public in their management of railways. What had they done? He presumed that the object of the Legislature in allowing these Acts to pass was to give greater facilities to the people to travel, and greater facilities for the transmission of goods. And what had been done? He found from the Report of Captain Tyler, the Government Inspector, made in 1871, that the number of miles of railway opened in 1852 was only 7,336; while in 1871 the number was 15,376, being an increase of 8,040 miles. The capital invested in railways in 1852 was £264,000,000; in 1871 it was £552,000,000 an increase of £288,000,000. The total receipts from all sources in 1852 were £15,700,000; in 1871 they were £48,900,000, an increase of £23,200,000. It was idle to say that Railway Companies did not provide the means of transit for the public. He believed that they had done more than any other interest in the State. Now, what had they received from the public in the way of remuneration for the great convenience they had given them? In 1860, the interest paid on the investments in railway property in the United Kingdom was 4.11 per cent; in 1865 it was 4.65 per cent, or a little over 4½ per cent; and what were the means they had provided for the transit of passengers? In 1850 the number of passengers carried—exclusive of season ticket holders—was 89,000,000, in 1872 it was 375,000,000, being an increase of 286,000,000. While the receipts therefrom had increased 210 per cent, the number of passengers carried had increased 321 per cent, clearly showing that Railway Companies had not pocketed the whole of the increased profits, but had given a fair share—he might almost say more than a fair share—to the public. He next came to a more important point, and that was the loss of life on railways, and he would ask the front Treasury bench, after hearing his figures, whether they really expected that any three Commissioners appointed by the Government could manage the vast bulk of passenger traffic with as much safety as had been done by the independent action of railway directors? According to Captain Tyler's Report in the years 1847, 1848, 1849, one person was killed to every 4,780,000 persons carried; in 1856, 1857, 1858, 1859, one person was killed to 8,700,000 carried; in 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, one person was killed to 9,600,000; and in 1871—and when he read the figures he could scarcely believe the facts—one person was killed to every 31,000,000 carried. What, then, was the mis-management of this vast railway interest, which had a capital of between £500,000,000 and £600,000,000? What was there in these figures that warranted the Minister of the day in coming to this House and asking that the Railway Companies might be put under the control of these three gentlemen? It seemed that the House was going into paternal legislation, and that it was thought that vast interests like the London and North-Western Railway, the North-Eastern Railway, the Midland Railway, and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways were not capable of taking care of their own concerns. They were to have three Commissioners. What were they to be? He was not a lawyer, but he had never heard any official so loosely described. He was to be “experienced in the law;” but he believed that if all the Judges put their heads together they would not succeed in giving a precise definition of that term. A man sentenced to penal servitude for ten years was quite experienced in the law, and in another ten years he would be still more “experienced.” If he was a man who had gone through the Bankruptcy Court several times he would have great experience in the law. He would not say that if this Bill had been drafted by one “learned in the law” it was the most slovenly Bill he had ever read; but he asserted that it was either most slovenly and carelessly drawn, or else it was drawn so as to give an idea that a man was to be appointed who had a knowledge of law, whilst the words of the Act did not convey that meaning. They might have used the usual words, “a barrister of five years’ standing.” The second was to have experience in railway business. Well, what did that mean? A platelayer had experience in railway business. The man who travelled much on railways had great experience in railway business. Under the terms, then, anybody could be nominated one of these Commissioners. Then it was very curious that although three

Commissioners were to be appointed, and two were described, the qualification of the third was not described at all, and he thought it was probably intended to appoint some one who had no experience either in law or in railway management. But these were the men who were to have the supreme control of the whole of the railways of the kingdom. The nation could never by Act of Parliament lay down rules for the management of railways which would be effective. There must be responsibility in the management of railways as in everything else. But if they prescribed rules they departed from the policy which had made the country great, of giving the widest freedom of action to individuals so long as they kept within the law. Parliament had laid down the principle of heavy damages, to prevent injury to passengers and damage to property which were assessed by juries in our Courts of Law. By a Return presented to the House of Lords on the subject, he found that for the five years, beginning in 1867 and ending in 1871 the total amount of compensation paid by the Railway Companies for loss of life, injuries sustained by passengers, and damage to property, was £2,350,000, being at the rate of £470,000 per annum. Here was a security to the public—a very fair security he should think. He thought that as Railway Companies were mercantile concerns, established in order to secure a good dividend to the shareholders, nothing could be a greater inducement to them not to neglect their duty than the knowledge that they would be liable to a fine of nearly £500,000 a-year. Proposals of the kind which took away from Parliament the power of making laws, and enabled Commissioners or Boards to make orders which should have the force of law, were never introduced in their fully developed form. They were always done in an insidious way. It was said the Commission was only to deal with through rates and with the contracts with the Post Office. But this was the thin end of the wedge, and if he mistook not it would be driven home until the Government would eventually purchase all the railways for the State. As to the Commission having any real practical effect in producing more punctuality, or the more effectual transmission of passengers and parcels from one part of the country, such an expectation would be futile. It was impossible that any three men such as would be appointed could deal properly with this enormous traffic. Having shown what had been the result of railway management in the hands of the Companies and the increase on the profits of their traffic, he wished to remind the House that the result of the management of the Government in the affairs of the country had raised the amount of taxation from £56,000,000 in 1853 to £71,500,000 in 1871; while, on the other hand, the Railway Companies had increased their receipts during that time 100 per cent. After the Government had shown that kind of management in public affairs he did not think Parliament would be justified in handing over the management of the railways to the State. The Bill proposed to appoint a First Commissioner at £3,000, two Commissioners at £2,000 each, and two Assistant Commissioners at £1,500 each, making £10,000 a-year without clerks, &c. Their duty would be to prevent accidents and insure greater punctuality in the delivery of goods, but if they interfered with the free action of the Railway Companies in the management of their business would they not relieve the Companies from their responsibility in the event of accidents or delay in the transit of goods? The whole thing must end in conferring upon the proposed Board very arbitrary and centralizing power and in placing the whole railway system under the management of the Government. Looking at these gigantic undertakings, and the enormous amount of money invested in them, Parliament ought to be jealous in placing them under the control of the Government, with such an extensive amount of patronage. There was another point to which he wished to refer, and that was the question of rates. The public seemed to think that because Railway Companies gave lower rates to certain individuals than the maximum rates, they ought to give them to everyone. Now, was that reasonable? Every manufacturer and large producer varied his terms according to the amount of his business with different individuals. What the House had a right to insist upon was that Railway Companies should not charge more than a certain amount for the carriage of passengers and goods.

But he submitted that it was an interference with the freedom of action and proper conduct of business to bind them to charge the same rate to everybody who came to them. He considered the question one of national importance. It was the first step towards taking railways under the control of the State; and, believing as he did, that our prosperity as a nation had arisen largely from our freedom to conduct our own affairs in the way we thought best, he felt bound to oppose this Bill, and therefore moved that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day six months.

Mr. GOLDNEY, in seconding the Motion, said, he did so because it was a subject which he thought ought to be fully discussed to satisfy the House and the public outside, who felt great alarm with respect to the provisions of the Bill. Either the project meant more than was shadowed forth, or it might be accomplished by much less expensive machinery than that contemplated by the Bill. According to the general scope of the Bill the Commissioners were to do no more than carry out the Railway and Canal Companies Act of 1854, which was simply for the settlement of through rates, but there was another provision which the Companies would not object to, and that was the publication of the rates for goods and cattle traffic as well as passenger traffic. This Bill emanated from the Report of the amalgamation Committee of last year—the Joint Committee appointed to consider the amalgamation of the various large systems of railway. The Committee sat a long time, and examined a great number of witnesses. Amongst others the traffic-manager of the North Western, the Great Western, and the Midland Companies, and a large number of gentlemen engaged in mercantile pursuits in the chief towns on the lines. During the sitting of that Committee, for some purpose or other, they chose to extend the inquiry a little further than the instructions given to them. The main object of the inquiry was whether amalgamation with respect to large Companies was desirable, or whether Parliament should keep up a system of competition, to protect the public. Companies had hitherto been so far controlled in their charges by Parliament almost every new Bill, or every extension, the Committee had imposed further restrictions on the amount of fares and rates which the Railway Companies might charge the public. For instance, in the case of the North Western Company, the maximum rate for first-class passengers was 2*d.* per mile, for second-class passengers 1½*d.*, and for third-class passengers 1*d.* He thought it much better that a power like that should still be exercised by Parliament than handed over to a Commission. The Joint Commission said that they considered that competition could not be maintained by legislation, that combination was increasing, that it was impossible to lay down any general rules as to the limits of amalgamation, that equal mileage rates were inexpedient, that a periodical revision of the rates was impracticable, and that fixed rates were undesirable. They further suggested that the Companies should exhibit books at each station showing the rate for goods; and that the administration of the Act of 1854 should be assigned to a special tribunal possessed of a knowledge of railway matters. Now, if that was to be done every one acquainted with railway management and interested in railway property would wish that a tribunal of that kind should be a tribunal of the highest character, composed of the best men they could select for the purpose, with such salaries as would make them rank with the Judges of the land, and should carry with them the same weight in the eyes of the public. There was an amended clause in the Bill, giving an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas in matters of law. Now, of three Commissioners possessing different qualifications there was a great chance that the decisions would depend a great deal on one mind. There ought to be some tribunal to which the decision of the Commissioners could be referred. The Commissioners were not only to determine matters in difference, but were to build up a policy, to create a code on which they should legislate. There were portions of the Bill relating to arbitration which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had expressed his willingness to modify. And before such a power as this Commission was created it would be wise for the House to consider whether the different railway regulations which now existed ought not to be consolidated or amended. There existed at the present time what he believed a large number of the public were unacquainted with, a great institution called the Railway Clearing-house, which had, under the Act of 1850, acquired many of the powers which, under the Bill, would be vested in the Commissioners. The authorities at the Clearing-house had endeavoured to regulate through rates; they had determined the monetary question as between one Company and another; they could settle disputes as to demurrage mileage rates, and what should be allowed under various circumstances by one Company to another. With such an institution in existence and the powers of the Court of Common Pleas under the Act of 1854, he did not see the necessity for immediate legislation. He had much pleasure in seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Fielden), because he thought the question involved was so large, so much larger than was contemplated by the Bill, that it would be much wiser for the Board of Trade to allow it to rest for a year, and to have a Committee appointed to consider the expediency of accommodating the different matters of railway arrangement in reference to a subject which so nearly affected the comfort and interest of the whole community.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Joshua Fielden),—instead thereof.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was not surprised at the speech which had been made by the hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Fielden), but was surprised to hear that he was not a railway director. The hon. Member seemed to have set up an imaginary case, in order that he might afterwards try to demolish it. He had talked of the powers to be conferred upon the Commissioners as something extraordinarily large, whereas he thought the House would see they were of a very limited nature. The hon. Gentleman had also fallen into another error by speaking of the proposed legislation as a direct violation of the agreement between the Railway Companies and the public, on the ground that the railways were created by Acts of Parliament, and that it was only by an Act of Parliament that their powers could be taken from them. A still further error had been committed by the hon. Gentleman when he spoke of the arbitrary action of the Commissioners; but any one who read the Bill would find that the powers to be vested in the Commissioners were the powers at present existing under Mr. Cardwell's Act of 1854, and which were simply to be transferred in their entirety to the new Board. The hon. Gentleman had also stated that the powers entrusted to the Court of Common Pleas had never been put in force, because the details brought before them were of so minute a character as to be unworthy of consideration; but the public felt that those powers ought to have been put in force, and wanted another tribunal to be created, which would deal more comprehensively and definitely with the question. The hon. Gentleman went on to ask what negligence the Railway Companies had been guilty of to subject them to such treatment at the hands of the Government, and showed, from official Returns, that the proportion of people killed by railway accidents was very small in comparison with the number of people who travelled by rail. But the real point was that many of those accidents might have been avoided, and such as the public said ought not to occur. Captain Tyler, in his Report on the Kirtlebridge accident, last year, said the records of the Board of Trade for many years pointed strongly and continuously to the difficulty that had existed in inducing Companies, especially the large and more powerful ones, to adopt improved systems of working, and principles of construction, even when they were of the most obvious character; and Captain Tyler added that the most extensive railway systems had far from kept pace with their constantly growing business and corresponding requirements. The Railway Companies, much as they had done in the interests of the public, had not fulfilled many of the requirements which would conduce to the safety of travelling, and therefore they were not in a position to come before Parliament and ask, "What have we done that you should find fault with us." The hon. Gentleman went on to say that it was absurd to create Commissioners to do work which such a Company as the London and North-Western Company was surely capable of doing for itself, and taking care of its own interests. But that was the very point. It was because these powerful Companies were far too strong and far too capable of taking care of their own interests that some central authority ought to be created, to see that the safe conduct of the public was properly cared for. If he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) wished to throw any obstacles in the way of the passing of the Bill it would simply be because he did not believe that the Government had foreseen all the difficulties of the case. He hoped that the Commission to be created would be a thoroughly efficient Commission, and one in which the public would have confidence, but he was afraid that the salaries proposed to be given to the members of it would rather limit its usefulness. The only blot he found in the Bill was that it hardly went far enough, for he would have liked to have seen the Commissioners entrusted with arbitration powers as to Companies and with many other duties relating to the safe travelling of the public. If the Companies did not themselves see the advantage of having a centralizing power among themselves, it was quite time that the Government provided such a central authority. In Germany there was such a central authority in existence, and its effects were found to be most advantageous. We should do well if we imitated such a system in this country. He hoped the House would support the Government in passing the present Bill, which he believed had long been called for.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would not have troubled the House at all upon this question if it had not been for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. He was glad that the Government had accepted an amendment of which he had given Notice, the object of which was to prevent the measure from being so construed as practically to give the Commission the power of revising the rates of the Railway Companies. By the terms of the Bill as it was originally drawn, power was thus given to the Commissioners, but that fact must certainly have escaped the notice of the right hon. Gentleman when the Bill was drawn, or doubtless he would not have inserted words of so strong a character. When the Joint Committee of last year drew up their Report, after hearing all the evidence, they came to the conclusion that if such a power were given to the Commissioners it would practically amount to confiscation. These were the very words of the Report, and it was only fair to other members of the Committee who were absent from this House to state that the Committee never intended to propose anything like confiscation. Still the words in the Bill were capable of that construction, and now that the matter had been pointed out he was glad to say that the Government had seen the force of that objection, and had withdrawn these words. As regarded the able speech of his hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Fielden), it reminded him a good deal of the sermons which they occasionally heard on Sundays, in the course of which the clergyman set up a very wicked man simply in order to knock him down again. No doubt if the Commissioners were to have the powers which the hon. Gentleman described, they would be very formidable persons indeed; but any hon. Gentleman would see from the Bill that they were practically to be bound hand and foot within the four corners of the Bill, and were to have nothing like the powers attributed to them by the hon. Gentleman. They would be appointed to carry out the Act of the 17 & 18 Vict., to exercise certain powers and duties now belonging to the Board of Trade, and under certain circumstances they were to be enabled to take arbitrations when Companies had quarrelled among themselves. In the matter of through rates the powers of the Commissioners would certainly be extended, but the House must remember that though it was quite true that the Railway Companies had not paid very large dividends, that was to a certain extent their own fault, for in the origin of railways the object of all railway directors seemed to be to fence round their own property, and instead of encouraging traffic to come along it, to keep all possible traffic away. He believed that if the present policy of the railway directors had been pursued from the commencement railways would have been in a far more prosperous condition than at the present time. The Railway Companies had large powers given to them originally in order to further the convenience of the public, and that fact should always be borne in mind. With regard to the question of through rates, it was clearly put before the Committee of last Session that in some cases the railways diverted the traffic in order to get higher rates, and it was shown that in the case of the South Yorkshire coalfields two Railway Companies agreed to raise the rates for conveying South Yorkshire coals to London to such an extent, in favour of coals from Derbyshire and other places, that practically the South Yorkshire coal ceased to come to London altogether. In such cases Parliament ought to interfere and say, "You are using the powers we give to you for purposes for which they were never intended." As to the composition of the proposed Commission, he hoped the position of the Commission would be raised to such a high standard that people of the same class as the Judges of the land would be upon it. In setting up a new tribunal it would be false economy not to have a good one—if the experiment were to be tried at all it should be well tried. He hoped the Government would take that into consideration before the Bill became law, and would offer such an inducement to men of the highest standing as would enable them to act as Commissioners. The Commission had been spoken of as if it were to interfere with railroad management, and lay down codes of rules, but nothing of the sort was intended. The Commissioners would simply be bound to administer the Act of Parliament, and many railway directors were in favour of having such a tribunal.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he had not spared bringing abuses of the railway system which had occurred in his own neighbourhood before the House, when the occasion required that he should do so; but he had found that the Companies become amenable, but he was not on that account inclined to dispute the desirability of codifying the railway law. He wished, however, to justify what had been asserted by his hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Fielden) to the effect, as this Bill had been presented to the House, it consisted virtually of a wholesale delegation of the powers of Parliament to the proposed Board of Commissioners. Now, the House was in a very peculiar position. Her Majesty's Government had a large majority in the House, and it had been stated by the Leader of the Opposition that in this present House the position of the Government appeared to him perfectly unassailable. This, he thought, should render the House of Commons careful to act in all these matters upon thoroughly constitutional principles in vindication of its Parliamentary rights. When he read the Bill, and particularly the 5th clause, what did he find? Not only was it proposed that the Commissioners should have all the statutory powers conferred upon the Board of Trade, but all the powers conferred by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854 upon the Courts and Judges of this country. But the proposals of the Bill did not stop there, for the concluding words of the clause conveyed that the decision of the Commissioners should have full as much effect as the decision of any of the authorities or Courts they would by this supersede; and in addition to all this, if the Bill were to pass, the Commissioners were to have the power which was conveyed by the words—"notwithstanding anything in any special Act" contained. Therefore these Commissioners were to have the full power of all the existing authorities and of the existing Courts, with power also to cancel and to abrogate special Acts of Parliament, wherever and whenever these might interfere with or impede the effect of their decisions. ["No, no!"] These were the concluding words of the 5th clause. [An hon. MEMBER: They are withdrawn.] But he (Mr. Newdegate) was speaking of the Bill as it was introduced, and of the powers that had been sought by the Bill from this House. He was glad to find that the House would grant no such power; that was the object of the few words that he was now venturing to address to the House. It was only fair to take the measure as it had been introduced, as the expression of the intention of the Government; such were the purposes for which the Bill had been introduced. By what had fallen from hon. Members who endeavoured to defend the measure, it was perfectly manifest that this Bill, which proposed to confer these powers upon the Commissioners referred to, was drawn to enable them, as the representatives of the Government, to vary the rates, and probably to assess the property of the Railway Companies. ["No, no!"] Then all he could say was, that many of the Amendments which had been assented to by the Government were perfectly needless if such as he had stated was not the purport of the Bill. When he read the Bill, he could not help saying to himself that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade were evidently importing some of their Irish ideas into English legislation. Well, they all knew that legislation was needed for Ireland which was not needed and was not justifiable for England. Why, the Irish people were declaring this every day. Thousands of the Irish people were perpetually lauding the departed Government of His Holiness the Pope as it existed in Rome and in the Pontifical States. Did we not hear of memorials? Did we not hear of lamentations over that departed Government? The House must surely understand that this was the form of Government the Irish people preferred, and desired to see established in Ireland. How were they to escape from that conclusion? No one was more ready to gratify this Irish idea than the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General. What he hoped was that the House would decide that these right hon. Gentlemen should limit the operation of these Irish ideas to Ireland, and should not import this arbitrary system into the legislation of England. When he looked at this Bill—and he was speaking of it as it was introduced, and not as he hoped it would be when amended—and speaking of the two right hon. Gentlemen, he remembered that the Postmaster General had managed the purchase of the telegraphs for the Government; and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman made a very good bargain in a pecuniary sense; but the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, if he had his will, as expressed in the original form of the Bill, would have obtained the control of the railways without purchase. The telegraphs had been purchased and paid for. No doubt it was a very economical manner of acquiring property to take it without paying for it. But it reminded him of the old story of the two makers of birch brooms. They were engaged in comparing the prices at which they could sell them, and one expressed himself very much surprised at the cheapness of the other's. They then went through the items, how much was the cost of labour and so on, in making these brooms; but at last one asked the other where he got the materials. "Oh!" was the reply, "I stole them." It appeared to him (Mr. Newdegate), therefore, that if the intention of the Bill were carried out, by which the House would obtain these Commissioners who were to be the delegates of the Government, the cheapness of the transaction would consist in possessing themselves virtually of railway property not by purchase but by seizure. He could only say, then, that he trusted the House would not only amend the Bill, as hon. Members had already given Notice, but if they passed the Bill that they would convert it into a codification of railway law, and not allow it to pass as the delegation of Parliamentary functions to a Government Commission.

Mr. G. BENTINCK thought it exceedingly proper that the Government should deal with the subjects contained in the Bill, and said his only objection to the scheme was that it did not go much further. In fact, the Government were neglecting their duty in not taking up the question whether the lives of travellers were to be constantly sacrificed by railway mismanagement. He asserted without fear of contradiction that a large portion of the railway accidents which annually caused loss of life might be prevented by Government interference. On many occasions he had endeavoured to press this matter upon the attention of the Government, and if they still disregarded it in spite of the fearful warnings they had had, they must be held responsible for the consequences of the accidents which occurred in future. He trusted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would see the necessity for taking these precautions, which were indispensable to prevent such accidents. Those who were opposed to Government interference argued that it would diminish the responsibility of the Railway Companies, but he contended that would not be the case, because if a Bill was passed requiring the Companies to make certain regulations for carrying on their traffic, the necessity of adhering to those regulations would tend to increase rather than diminish their responsibility.

Mr. DENISON said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Bentinck) had thrown down a challenge to railway directors in the House, for he implied that they could not in future oppose any suggested legislation without bringing upon themselves a considerable amount of odium. He happened to be a railway director, and directors represented the interests of large bodies of proprietors, in whose name they must speak more or less; but in any observations he might now address to the House, he should not speak on behalf of any Railway Company or association, and the criticism he made must be judged on its own merits as expressing his individual opinion. He knew nothing of the intention of his hon. Colleague until he saw his Amendment on the Paper, and but for the announcement of the President of the Board of Trade he should have supported the Amendment. In declining to oppose the second reading, the Railway Companies had in a certain sense given a negative sanction to legislation in the direction suggested by the Committee of last year—that was to say, they were willing that a tribunal should be created for the better carrying out Mr. Cardwell's Act, and some other purposes enumerated in the Joint Committee's Report; but he did not admit, because the Railway Companies had neglected to oppose the second reading, that therefore they were to accept the tribunal pure and simple as proposed by the President of the Board of Trade. The proposed jurisdiction of the tribunal was a very serious matter for the Railway Companies, and the right hon. Gentleman having agreed to drop the words in the 5th clause overriding other Acts of Parliament, the discussion turned upon the powers, functions, duties, and authority of the new tribunal. It would not only absorb the powers of the Board of Trade—and, in some cases, of arbitrators—but it would be a judicial authority, which would form its own rules and mode of procedure; and, as provided in the 22nd clause, every decision and order of the Commissioners would be final. It was not to be reasonably supposed that the Railway Companies would submit their interests to any body of gentlemen, however distinguished, without appeal. The more able the members of the tribunal were, the more despotic it would be; and the effect of this scheme would be to establish a sort of Railway Star Chamber, capable of interpreting its own jurisdiction on the most elastic principles. What he wished to do now was to put in a caveat against its being imagined that the Railway Companies could accept such a tribunal without important modification of its powers. After the statement of the President of the Board of Trade, he believed a division would not be taken on the Amendment; but he reserved to himself liberty to oppose the powers of the new tribunal in Committee.

Mr. HENLEY said, he hardly wondered at the discussion which had taken place. He wished the Government had seen fit to commit the Bill pro forma, in order to insert the long string of Amendments they proposed. When he looked at the Bill as introduced, it seemed to have in it what the late Sir John Jervis, then Attorney General, would have called "a great deal of white brandy." At first he did not think much of it, but on examination he found it gave power to act in spite of Acts of Parliament. What would be the use of an appeal to the President of the Board of Trade upon a mere question of law when the Commissioners would have power to repeal laws? He had no concern in railways, but he was of opinion that this Bill must have shaken public faith in property. No man could have read the Bill, and seen how it was proposed to deal with the vast amount of property which had been expended to the enormous benefit of the country, without receiving a considerable shock. If he might venture to say so, the mode of proceeding adopted by the Government was contrary to common sense. The principle advocated 19 years ago, of bringing the network of railways over the country into one harmonious whole, was a very proper one, and in extending it anyone would have thought that the natural idea would have been to create a tribunal in which the country would have had at least as much confidence as they had in the authority to be abolished. Would any hon. Member of the Government assert that owners of property could have the same confidence in three persons, removable at the pleasure of the Government, as in the Judges of the land? One of these gentlemen was to be "a person experienced in the law." That was a new, curious, and dubious phrase. He had heard of persons "learned in the law," and of Revising Barristers of so many years standing, but he had never seen this description before. The next was to be a gentleman "experienced in railway matters." It was difficult to understand that definition. A man might be experienced in railways by riding on them, by making them, or by getting them up; and all these things, apart from experience of management, might come within this blessed definition. As to the third gentleman, nothing was said of him; he was to be "a Christian at large." The right hon. Gentleman had amended one strange provision of the Bill, which would have empowered these three gentlemen to send for anybody's account books without any limit. By the clause as amended they would only have power to send for those documents which were relevant to the matters in hand; and he hoped that in like manner they would be restrained from going into anybody's premises, or otherwise one of these gentlemen might walk into the Queen's bedchamber, or any other place in the kingdom, without anybody being able to find fault. The Bill was somewhat loosely drawn, and would tend to shake people's faith in Parliament in regard to their treatment of property. A great deal had been said at public meetings and in the newspapers lately about the State purchasing the railways, and no doubt it would be very convenient to set up a Commission to depreciate this property before the Government bought it. It was important that due provision should be made for the proper management of railways; but he hoped that as the Bill passed through Committee various points would receive their needful adjustment, that justice would be done to those who had invested their money in railways, and that nothing would be done inconsistent with the due recognition of the great benefit railways had conferred on the country.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that, after he had given some explanation of the object of this measure, the House would go into Committee upon it at once. The hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Fielden), who moved this Amendment, appeared to think that the Government proposed to take the management of the railways through the means of a public Department. [MR. FIELDEN: I think I said that this was the thin end of the wedge.] Some hon. Members who followed went a great deal further. One hon. Member said that, in the 5th clause, the Government proposed to give the Commissioners power to alter rates and fares, and that the whole idea was either directly or indirectly to bring about the purchase of railways by the Government, and their entire management by a Public Department. The Joint Committee had made no recommendation in favour of the purchase of railways by the State, and the very object of this Bill, in his opinion, was to render anything of the kind out of the question, and at the same time to secure to the public the securities which they required. The Bill proposed to transfer from the Court of Common Pleas the jurisdiction conferred upon that Court by the Act of 1854, and thus carried out the advice of Lord Campbell, who said that the Judges, and himself amongst them, felt themselves incompetent to decide the matters imposed upon them under that Act, being wholly unacquainted with railway matters. The power to enforce through rates was really in accordance with the principles of the Act of 1854, and was the main Amendment in that Act which the Committee thought most desirable in the public interest. The Bill was intended to carry out the views of the Committee, and he trusted the Amendment of the hon. Member would not be pressed.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Definitions).

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 21, after the word "station," to insert the words "siding, wharf, or dock."—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue.)

MR. LEEMAN said, that the statements made by the President of the Board of Trade and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster led to the conclusion that this Bill was limited to one object. He (Mr. Leeman) wished to have a definition of the meaning of the word "Docks." The term was a very general one, and there was no knowing where such interest was to begin, and where it was to end. Various Docks held rights subject to various Acts of Parliament, such as the Docks at Sunderland and at Hull. Some of these Docks were largely mixed up with other undertakings, and he submitted that a clear understanding should be arrived at upon the question.

MR. CHILDERS said, that only Docks belonging to Railway Companies would come within the scope of the Amendment. These Docks had generally come into the possession of Railway Companies since 1854; and, in some cases, they formed an integral part of their system. The retention of the word was therefore necessary.

MR. DENISON felt sure that had the Amendment appeared in the original draft of the Bill, the Railway Companies concerned would have opposed it.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 48: Majority 35.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Clause 4 (Appointment of Railway Commissioners).

MR. MONK proposed, in line 24, to leave out "of experience in the law," and insert "a barrister of at least 14 years' standing."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL suggested that if the words "barrister-at-law" were inserted, they should leave the matter there without any further qualification. Perhaps, the Committee were not aware there was no limitation with respect to the appointment of Judges in the Court of Common Pleas, who might be appointed the day after they had been called to the Bar. All that the law required was that they should be barristers, and the system had never led to any difficulty.

MR. GREGORY said, he hoped the Amendment would not be agreed to. The object of the clause as it stood was to enable the Government not necessarily to appoint a barrister; but if they thought proper a gentleman belonging to any branch of the profession, which he thought was a very liberal act on the part of the Government.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESQUE said, that, as a matter of fact, the first gentleman who would be appointed under the words of the clause would be a barrister-at-law of more than 14 years' standing; but his own feeling was, undoubtedly, that which had been expressed by the hon. Member who had just sat down. He thought it quite possible, although it might not be so in the first instance, that some very suitable gentleman might be found and appointed who was not a barrister, but a solicitor.

MR. LEEMAN was very glad to hear the announcement made by the right hon. Gentleman. It was very desirable that it should be left open to the Government to select a gentleman who was not a barrister, but a member of any branch of the profession. Representing, as he did, the railway interest to a great extent in that House, it was due to them to say that they most cordially concurred in what had been said in the earlier part of the evening, when Government were urged to take care that the gentlemen forming this Commission should be men of the highest standing—certainly not inferior to that of a Puisne Judge, with at least an equal salary. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be permitted in the slightest degree to influence the Government on the question of salary. The gentlemen appointed should be men of the highest possible position with corresponding emolument.

MR. MONK said, that when he first read the Bill he was of opinion that the phrase, "gentlemen experienced in the law," was a very curious one. However, he now entertained very little doubt that the Government would select a person who would have the confidence both of that House and of the country. At the same time, he objected to the selection being from the lower branch of the profession to fill so important an office as that of Chief Judge; because a gentleman, however distinguished he might have been as an attorney or solicitor, would be placed in a false position, if called upon to preside, if he had previously been a member of a firm extensively engaged in railway business.

MR. GILPIN hoped the Government would keep the words as they were.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON believed that unless men of first-rate powers and position were appointed as Commissioners in the first instance, these important duties would, sooner or later, fall into the hands of men who would not command the confidence of the country.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would not pledge himself that the man of the highest rank should be the legal member. The salaries of the three Commissioners would be equal—£3,000 a-year each; and he believed men of high capacity and standing might be secured to perform the duties. No doubt the duties would be of great importance, but not of so embarrassing a kind as gentlemen in public life were often exposed to in this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was a warm supporter of the Bill, and very readily assented to salaries of that amount, which he (Mr. C. Fortescue) thought sufficient for the purpose.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the right hon. Gentleman might secure the services of these gentlemen who would command the confidence of the country; but that was not the question they had now to determine. The question was whether as a rule they could command the services of the best men for the salary proposed. His own Motion was that the salary ought to be placed higher, so as to put the Commissioners on the same footing as the Puisne Judges.

MR. GREGORY thought that the Commissioners should be co-ordinate in jurisdiction and equal in salary.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that by the Bill they were made so.

MR. W. H. SMITH wished to know, as it did not appear from the Bill, whether the Commissioners would be eligible to sit in Parliament.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Commissioners could not sit in Parliament without a special authorization, which the Bill did not contain.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he believed that no gentleman who had the confidence of the public and great experience of railway affairs would be induced to accept the office of Commissioner at a salary of £3,000. It was a fact known to many that gentlemen who really had experience and knowledge, and whose authority would be accepted by the railway world and the public, had at present the command of higher salaries, with much greater expectations.

MR. GOLDNEY suggested that the Commissioners should take rank after Her Majesty's Judges.

MR. DENISON said, he would like to know if the powers of the Inspecting Department of the Board of Trade would still remain.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Department of the Board of Trade had charge of the general safety of the public, which was not dealt with at all by the Joint Committee of last year, nor by this Bill; and in relation to this subject the Board of Trade would remain entirely independent of the Commission. The Commissioners would not be in the position of Inspectors.

MR. CHARLEY proposed to substitute "a member of the legal profession" for "a person experienced in the law." The words "experienced in the law" had never been recognized in any Act of Parliament before.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL thought that the words were the best that could be used to describe a lawyer. If they inserted the words, "member of the legal profession," that would exclude men who had perhaps only left the Bar and taken their names off the books a week before.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved to add, after line 29, the Proviso—

"That it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, if he think fit, to remove for inability or misbehaviour any Commissioner appointed in pursuance of this Act."

The Commissioners would be independent of Parliament in so far as they would be removable only by the Lord Chancellor on the grounds stated in this Proviso. They would be placed, in short, on the same footing as the County Court Judges, the Proviso being taken from the County Court Judges Act.

MR. RATHBONE hoped that if the office of the Commissioners was found to be useless, and it was abolished, there would be no necessity for compensation.

MR. CHILDERS said, the appointments were made for five years, and if at the end of that time the office was abolished, no compensation would be given.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, was ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 5 and 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Differences between railway and canal companies to be referred to Commissioners).

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved as an Amendment the addition of a Proviso—

"That the power of compelling a reference to the Commissioners in this section contained shall not apply to any case in which any person has in any general or special Act been designated as arbitrator by his name or by the name of his office, or in which, a standing arbitrator having been appointed under any general or special Act, the Commissioners are of opinion that the difference in question may more conveniently be referred to him."

MR. LEEMAN wished to know why the latter part of the Proviso had been introduced. Where would be the power of the Commissioners if this Amendment were passed?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE explained that he had inserted the words because there were certain cases in which Railway Companies, being in close relations with one another for working purposes, had appointed a standing arbitrator to settle numerous small points in dispute between them. It had been represented to him that it would be a mistake to compel a reference in all such cases to the Commissioners.

MR. MONK thought that the Proviso was unnecessary, and that it would be very unsatisfactory to the public.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, it would only apply in those cases where there were close working arrangements between two or more Companies. It would in no way affect the settlement of points in dispute between the Companies and the public.

Proviso agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Explanation of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 2. as to through traffic).

Mr. Rathbone

MR. RATHBONE moved, in page 5, line 4, after "that," to insert—

"The provisions of the said section for prohibiting undue or unreasonable preference, advantage, prejudice, or disadvantage as between different persons, companies, or descriptions of traffic, shall be held to extend to any undue or unreasonable preference, advantage, prejudice, or disadvantage between different towns or localities."

He said that Railway Companies had no more right to give a preference to towns or localities than to an individual.

MR. LEEMAN said, that the Amendment would shut up all the ports on the Lancashire coast except Liverpool. Such a provision would be utterly unworkable. An express train running between one town and a distant town might be made to stop at every intermediate town, lest there might be an inequality between towns. It would stop the traffic of half the coast towns in the country.

MR. W. H. SMITH hoped that the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) would withdraw his Amendment. Nothing more absurd and impracticable was ever proposed.

MR. CHILDERS said, the principle of equal mileage rates was carefully considered by the Committee last year, and was unanimously concluded to be impracticable. The law secured equal treatment to traders in the same town, but rates as between one town and another were inextricably bound up with railway, sea, canal, or other competition, the rate for coal between London and the North of England, for example, being governed by the sea competition. The complaints urged by certain localities and traders before the Committee would be altogether, or nearly altogether, met by the clause as to through rates, and a rigid rule of this kind would be impracticable.

MR. RATHBONE contended that the words—"undue or unreasonable preference" in his Amendment would be construed by the Commissioners as covering the questions of amount of traffic, cost of line, and competition.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS pointed out that under an equal mileage rate the colliery nearest Liverpool would be able to sell its coal at a lower price than one a few miles more distant, and the manufacturing town nearest Liverpool would have an advantage as regarded cotton. Cotton goods were now sent to Fleetwood at a cheap rate; was this an undue preference as against Liverpool? A Company ought not to be allowed to fix a higher rate in one locality as compensation for a low rate in another where greater competition existed; but he doubted whether the Amendment would prevent this.

MR. LANCASTER said, that other parties might be interested in procuring a through rate as well as a Railway Company; but the clause only enabled the Commissioners to act in this matter at the request of any Railway Company. He, therefore, moved the addition of words enabling "any person interested" to apply for a through rate,

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 8, after the words "such Company," to insert the words "or of any person interested."—(Mr. Lancaster.)

MR. CHILDERS said, he objected on the part of the Government, on the ground that it would throw such an enormous mass of business on the Commissioners that they could not undertake to discharge it. It was never intended to make this a general traffic Bill. For all practical purposes it would be sufficient to give the the Companies power to enforce through rates on each other.

MR. WOODS said, that a colliery company or a large mercantile firm might sometimes have quite as much traffic to send over a given line as an adjoining Railway Company. He did not think that a complaint of the want of a through rate so made would be at all frivolous, and it was a right which ought to be conferred upon persons interested.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) would by-and-bye propose an addition to the clause giving a locus standi before the Commissioners to Corporations or Chambers of Commerce of any town or locality, or to any 10 inhabitant traders, in case the clause were contravened.

MR. GREGORY thought there ought to be some provision in favour of the public, and that the appeal should not be confined to Railway Companies only.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the supposition in the clause was that some Railway Company would be found willing to take the traffic and carry it as far as it could. If all the railways were in the hands of one body there would be no difficulty. But the continuous lines of railway might be in the hands of various proprietors. The Bill provided that when the traffic had been carried as far as the Company could carry it, it should not be stopped at that point. He could not agree to the Amendment.

MR. STAPLETON suggested that the Company which received the traffic in the first instance should not only forward it, but use its Parliamentary powers to get it carried on by other Companies.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 40; Noes 109: Majority 69.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved, in page 5, line 31, after "accordingly," to insert—

"Provided always, That in no case shall it be lawful for the Commissioners to compel any Company to accept lower rates than the rates which such Company may for the time being legally be charging for like traffic on any other line of communication between the same points, or if there be no such other line of communication for like traffic, under like circumstances or as near thereto as may be on the Company's line in that immediate district."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE having assented to the alteration,

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved to insert the following words after line 37—

"(7.) The Commissioners in apportioning the through rate shall take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, including any special expense incurred in respect of the construction, maintenance, or working of the route, or any part of the route, as well as any special charges which any Company may have been entitled to make in respect thereof."

MR. PIM said, he thought that Railway Companies that owned or worked steam vessels should be bound to afford facilities to the owners of other steam vessels for the transmission of traffic on their systems of railways and canals. He begged, therefore, to move, at the end of line 42, the insertion of a clause which would secure that object.

"Every Railway or Canal Company so long as they use, maintain, or work, or are party to an arrangement for using, maintaining, or working steam vessels for the purpose of carrying on a communication between any towns or ports, shall afford due facilities on all parts of their systems of Railway or Canal to other owners of steam vessels for the transmission of traffic of all classes which may be conveyed or intended to be conveyed in the steam vessels belonging to such owners, at the same throughout rate of charge as may at the time be charged for similar classes of traffic conveyed by the Railway or Canal Company on their lines of Railway or Canal, and in steam vessels used, maintained, or worked by them; Provided such other owners of steam vessels conveying the traffic agree to receive out of the through rate of charge (after payment in the first instance to each party entitled to the same, the allowance due for terminals or cartage, or other payments made on account of the traffic), such part as may be in proportion to the distance which the traffic is conveyed in such steam vessels as compared with the distance it is conveyed by Railway or Canal."

Mr. PEASE opposed the Amendment on the ground that it would act most unfairly to the Railway or Canal Company who might own the vessels.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE had considerable sympathy with the object of his hon. Friend, so far as he understood it; but the words of the Amendment, as it stood, could not be incorporated in the Bill; and, for the sake of further consideration, he would suggest to his hon. Friend to bring up similar words on a future stage of the Bill.

Mr. MONK moved, in line 42, to add the words—

"And all the provisions of this section shall apply to every Canal, whether such Canal communicates with the Canal of the receiving, forwarding, or delivering Company, directly or indirectly, by means of any river or estuary, or of the sea, and so far as they are applicable shall extend to all Railway and Canal Companies, whether carriers or receivers of tolls only."

Mr. W. S. STANHOPE thought there was much weight in the suggestion, and he hoped it would receive the sanction of the President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. CHILDERS inquired how there could be a through rate when part of the route was the open sea, open to all the world? The very idea of a rate implied that there was some owner of the road or water-way who could impose it alike on all who used that road or water-way. The proposal was quite foreign to the scope of the Bill.

Mr. MONK replied that no rates would be required if an arm of the sea were used.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. RATHBONE proposed to add, at the end of the clause—

"A complaint of a contravention of the said enactment, or of this section, with respect to any town or locality, may be made to the commissioners by a corporation or chamber of commerce thereof, or of any place included therein, or by not less than ten persons being inhabitant traders of, or whose business includes the forwarding of goods to such town or locality, without proof that the complainants or any of them are personally aggrieved by the contravention."

Mr. LAING said, he thought that they should adhere to the scope of the Bill, and not add such an Amendment.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON suggested that parties aggrieved only should be allowed to complain.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS observed that Mr. Cardwell's Act gave individuals the right to complain.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, it was an important question whether any public body should have any locus standi before the Commission, but he put it to the hon. Member whether the question could properly be raised on that part of the Bill, as he now raised it.

Mr. GOLDNEY observed that the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) had all he wanted under his Amendment given to him by the Act of 1854, which gave to any person complaining of want of reasonable facilities power to apply to the Court of Common Pleas, whose powers were transferred by this measure to three Commissioners.

Mr. GREGORY said, he doubted whether the Act of 1854 secured the object desired. He suggested that a large trader should have power to apply to the forwarding Company to put the Commissioners in motion, and in case of its neglect or refusal should himself have a right of doing so.

Mr. CHILDERS said, he could not concur in this suggestion. If it was the interest of the forwarding Company to apply to the Commissioners, they would do so without being asked, and the Joint Committee had declined to recommend that every trader should have the power of applying. Such a power might be given hereafter if it were found that the public interest demanded it, which he believed would not be the case.

Mr. ELLIOTT said, he supplied about 120,000 tons of coal annually to the Imperial Gas Company of London. As the clause stood he should have to apply to the North Eastern Railway Company to apply to the Commissioners for through rates with the Great Northern Company, the former having harbours and ports of their own, to which it was their interest to take the coal. He ought not to be deprived of the right of appealing to the Commissioners if the

North Eastern Company refused to put the Commissioners in motion.

MR. RATHBONE said, he would withdraw his Amendment, but he reserved to himself the right to bring it up hereafter as a new clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, it now became his duty to move the addition of words of which he had given Notice in the beginning of the evening. His object in moving them was that there might be no mistake in the minds of hon. Members or of the tribunal as to the meaning of Clause 10. In certain cases the ordering of a through rate by the Commissioners might be rendered absolutely impossible, and the whole clause might become illusory, if a Railway Company were to charge its maximum rates, and decline to charge anything less. In order to make the meaning of the clause perfectly clear on this point, he proposed to add the following words:—

"Nothing in any special Act contained shall be construed so as to prevent the Commissioners from ordering and apportioning a through rate under this section."

These words would add nothing to the intention of the clause; they could not possibly go beyond its scope, and their only effect would be to make the meaning of the Legislature absolutely clear.

MR. DENISON said, this Amendment seemed to be in substance a revival of the words which the right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn upon Clause 5. They were words of the deepest import to Railway Companies, and he should therefore move to report progress in order that those Companies might have time to consider them.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE reminded the Committee that in withdrawing the previous Amendment he had stated distinctly that it would be necessary to make Clause 10 effective in this way. The clause could have no other meaning than that now assigned to it. Any other interpretation would assume nothing less than an act of hypocrisy on the part of the Joint Committee.

MR. LEEMAN appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether he thought it was reasonable towards the Railway Companies that he should now press an Amendment of which the House heard for the first time. The construction to be put upon these words might be of the utmost possible consequence to Railway Companies, and all he would ask of the right hon. Gentleman was that he should postpone his Amendment, which, so far as he understood it, went to revive the objectionable words which they were all so anxious to see struck out of the Bill.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN, said that as several hon. Friends around him had great doubts as to what the effect of the proposed words might be he would suggest that the Amendment should be postponed till the bringing up of the Report, though he did not put quite the same construction upon the words as was put upon them by the hon. Member.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was rather inclined to take the view of the right hon. Gentleman (Colonel Wilson Patten) that these words had not the character which some hon. Members had given to them, but still he would suggest that they should be brought up on the Report.

MR. LAING remarked that it was absolutely necessary that these words should be postponed, because it was impossible to say otherwise whether they were consistent or not with the important Proviso which had been adopted on the Motion of the hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Mr Cross.)

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought the Committee would acknowledge that he had been perfectly frank with them on this matter. He wished to point out to the gentlemen who represented the railway interests, that if the clause meant anything within its carefully defined limits it must have the meaning he assigned to it in the addition he proposed. If it meant that a Railway Company might, by pointing to its maximum, avoid the orders of the Commissioners, the whole clause would be a farce. The Amendment had no application, except to the through rates as defined and limited by the clause. At the same time he was willing to let the clause pass as it was, but on the distinct understanding that he would bring up the words again on the Report, or re-commit the Bill for the purpose of inserting them, and that the words meant nothing more than he had described. He believed that all parties were anxious to get through Committee that evening.

MR. LEEMAN said, that all he had risen for the purpose of doing was to express a desire, on the part of those who were largely interested in this question, that they should have an opportunity of considering these words, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had any right to complain of such a request being made.

Clause 11 (Publication of rates).

MR. STEVENSON moved, page 6, line 5, to insert after the word "contract" the following words, "and stating the distance from that station or wharf of every station, wharf, siding, or place to which any such rate is charged;" the object being to show the distance for which the rates were charged.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. P. PRICE moved, page 6, line 6, to leave out from "every such book" to "direct" in line 14, inclusive, on the ground of the vast trouble that would be involved in the requirement without any advantage to the public. The object of the clause seemed to be that the public should be informed how much of the total rate they paid for carriage of goods along the railway, and how much by way of terminal charge. In the Midland Company alone the provision would involve a great deal of trouble, and the Returns could not be prepared before alteration in the rates had become necessary, so that the preparation of them would be simply impossible. But in the great majority of cases there was no terminal charge at all. This terminal charge was given under different Acts of Parliament, and the Companies were allowed to charge in addition to the toll a reasonable sum for loading, stopping, sheltering, and unloading at the terminus. There was no reason why the charge should be dissected as was now proposed.

MR. LANCASTER could safely say that there had been more dispute about this terminal charge than anything else. The question arose in almost every negotiation with a Railway Company, and if there was anything vague in it, the Company always said, "Oh! that is for terminus." If this portion of the clause was withdrawn, the public would be left without any remedy in one of the most important matters complained of.

MR. MONK said, it was one of the recommendations of the Committee of last year, to the effect that Companies should be compelled to exhibit at every station the rates they charged for goods, distinguishing the mileage and terminal charges, and stating the special rates and contracts.

MR. LIDDELL also opposed the Amendment. There was a large sum charged in the shape of terminal charges but nobody knew for what. In the case of coal and iron no covering was required, and what people who sent those goods by railway desired was to be told what they were paying for. There could, he thought be no fairer demand.

MR. PEASE said, that even if the proposal of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Price) were agreed to, every person who applied to a Railway Company to distinguish the terminal charges from the carriage rates in the amount charged against him would be furnished with the information under the provisions of an existing Act of Parliament.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Companies were bound to supply the information when it was asked for, and he saw no reason why they should not supply it beforehand. All that was wanted was that the book of rates and terminal charges kept by the station clerk for his own guidance should be open to the inspection of the public where they wished it.

MR. WOOD hoped the Government would adhere to the clause as it stood, and insist upon the Companies supplying the information asked for.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, this was a point of very considerable difficulty, to which the Joint Committee of last year gave a great deal of attention, and which he had endeavoured to understand as well as he could. He was bound to say the words of the clause, as they stood, would impose upon Railway Companies a vast amount of trouble and labour, which in a great many cases would be of no use to the public. He quite agreed as to the importance of having rates of all kinds, including special rates, in the books kept at each station for the use of the station-master; and there could be no difficulty in Companies giving to the public access to that information; but information as to terminals was not contained in the books which lay at the respective stations, and in the great majority of cases there was no necessity for distinguishing between terminals and rates. The objection to this part of the clause was that what ought to be the exception was made the rule; he would therefore propose a tertium quid between the two views, which, he thought, would meet the necessities of the public without requiring Companies to go to vast trouble without any corresponding public advantage. He would leave out the words "Every such book shall" and say—

"The Commissioners may from time to time on the application of any person interested make orders with respect to any particular description of traffic, requiring a railway or canal company to distinguish, &c."

That Amendment would do all the public required.

MR. MUNTZ approved the change proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. LANCASTER thought a scale ought to be published, as was done in France and Germany.

Amendment (Mr. Price), by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FLETCHER thought this was a subject for more careful consideration than could now be given to it, and on this ground he moved to report progress.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said there could be no reason for not getting through the Bill to-night, as this was not a vital question by any means.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) proposed, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. STEVENSON moved to insert after "direct," in line 14, "the rates and tolls charged for the carriage of traffic from any siding, wharf, or place, not being a station, shall be in like manner shown in a book or books to be kept at the nearest station to such siding, wharf, or place."

MR. PEASE said, that this proposal would involve an immense addition to the work of the Companies, and consequently to the charges on the public.

Amendment negatived.

VOL. CCXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Clause 12 (Arrangements between railway and canal companies).

MR. LANCASTER said, that in his neighbourhood, where they had only a canal, the charge for conveying cotton was 5s. per ton. They had now two railways and a canal, but the canal was worked by one of the Railway Companies, and the result was that the charge for cotton was 7s. 3d. per ton. He moved to insert after the word "managing" the words "or connected with or interested in the management of."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said that the hon. Member's object was good, but there was a vagueness in the words, "or connected with." He had no objection to insert the words "interested in the management of."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 13 and 14 agreed to.

Clauses 15 and 16 struck out.

Clause 17 agreed to.

Clause 18 (Salary of Commissioners) and Clause 19 (Appointment of Officers) postponed.

Clause 20 (Quorum of Commissioners).

MR. ASSHETON CROSS approved the first part of the clause, which required appeals from the order of one Commissioner to be heard by all the Commissioners, but objected to enable one Commissioner to exercise any power vested in them by the Act.

MR. GREGORY, in order to give time for further consideration of the question, moved that the Chairman report progress.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE hoped the Bill would be got through to-night. It was unnecessary to require the presence of all or even of two of the Commissioners in every case, for one Commissioner would be able to do some of the business, subject to a re-hearing, if desired, by the whole body.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that one Commissioner would be sufficient in many cases, there being the safeguard of an appeal to all the Commissioners.

MR. DENISON feared there would be an indisposition on the part of the Commissioners to revise the decision of one of their number, more especially as there would be no further appeal on a question of facts.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought that to secure uniformity of decision, all three Commissioners should sit together at first at any rate as often as possible.

MR. MELLY objected to the Committee reporting progress.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE hoped that the Committee would not report progress. He proposed to withdraw Clause 20 for the present, and, after careful consideration, bring up a new clause on the Report.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Gregory.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 146: Majority 94.

Clause 20 postponed.

Clause 21 (Powers of Commissioners).

MR. MUNTZ complained that extraordinary powers, unknown to the law, were proposed to be given by this clause—namely, that the Commissioners were to try cases both of law and fact.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was a very common practice, especially in Chancery.

MR. MUNTZ moved the omission of sub-section A, which enabled the Commissioners to "enter any place or building" for the purposes of making inquiries for giving effect to the Act.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the clause was a very important one, defining, as it did, the powers of the Commissioners, and deserved more attention and consideration than it was likely to receive at that hour (half-past 12 o'clock). He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consent to progress being reported.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL, in reference to the Motion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), for the omission of the sub-section, stated that the words objected to had been copied from the Railways Clauses Amendment Act. A power which had not been abused by Inspectors appointed by the Board of Trade was not likely to be so by the Commissioners.

MR. MUNTZ still objected to the words to which he had called the attention of the Committee, and submitted that it would be better to report progress, in order that the clause might be more carefully considered.

Mr. Assheton Cross

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE thought that if the Commission was to be set up, it must at least be armed with necessary powers for the purposes of the Act.

MR. FIELDEN moved that the Committee report progress.

Motion agreed to.

Committee Report Progress: to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

ARMY.—AUTUMN MANŒUVRES.

QUESTION.

MR. SCLATER BOOTH asked the Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that no alteration had been made in the 66th clause of the Mutiny Bill, the Government was prepared to make an allowance, out of the compensation money, for losses accruing to licensed victuallers by the passage of large bodies of troops to and from the Autumn Manœuvres. Looking at the large number of troops which these manœuvres brought into unfrequented districts, and the costs thereby imposed upon the keepers of public houses and the high price of meat and other provisions, the Government ought to take this matter into consideration.

MR. OTWAY confirmed the statement of the hardship inflicted on innkeepers on whom soldiers were billeted owing to the increased price of provisions.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT bore testimony to the willingness with which the troops were received wherever they went.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the mode of quartering the troops in the district with which he was connected had been attended with considerable inconvenience.

SIR HENRY STORKS: It has been considered not advisable to alter in the Mutiny Act the allowance ordinarily granted to innkeepers for meals supplied to soldiers because of a rise in the prices which may prove to be temporary, but the Government has under consideration a proposal to allow temporarily an increased rate in consequence of the present high prices of provisions. The proposal includes the same allowance to be given retrospectively to those publicans on whom the difference operated exceptionally last year in consequence of the large numbers billeted upon them during the Autumn Manœuvres. With respect to forage, they did not consider that the same grievance existed. The expenses would be defrayed from the sum estimated for the movements of the troops. Vote 10.

MUTINY BILL.—THIRD READING.

COLONEL NORTH called attention to the ruling of the Deputy Judge Advocate as to desertion, and mentioned a case in which a soldier having absented himself nine times, and at last struck off the strength of his regiment, was convicted by a court-marshal and sentenced to imprisonment. The Deputy Judge Advocate quashed the conviction, holding that a man could not be convicted of desertion unless it was proved that he did not intend to return. But how could intention be proved? As the men were not now marked, the officers had nothing to guide them, and the desertions this year alone had amounted to 6,000. Such a state of things was a disgrace to the Army.

MR. CARDWELL pointed out that absence without leave and desertion were totally different crimes, although there were severe punishments for both; and submitted that it was the duty of a court-martial to convict only for the crime which had been actually committed. As to proving a man's intention, that had to be done in order to secure a conviction for larceny. The present Deputy Judge Advocate was appointed in 1869, but the edition of "Simmons' Manual," the text book in these matters, published in 1863, contained this definition: "Desertion is the illegal absence of an officer or soldier from duty without the intention of returning." Therefore the Deputy Judge Advocate had not introduced a new ruling, by laying it down that intention was an essential ingredient in the crime of desertion. He rejoiced at the abolition of marking, and corporal punishment, and while he hoped courts-martial would severely punish men convicted of crime, he trusted they would not find a man guilty of a crime he had not committed.

Bill read the third time and passed.

JURIES (IRELAND).

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire and report on the working of the Irish Jury system before and since the passing of the Act 34 and 35 Vic. c. 65; and, whether any and what amendments in the Law are necessary to secure the due administration of justice."—(Mr. Bruen.)

And, on April 2, Committee nominated as follows:—The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, DR. BALL, Mr. HERON, Mr. BOURKE, Viscount CRICHTON, The O'CONNOR DON, Sir ROWLAND BLENNERHASSETT, Lord CLAUD HAMILTON, Major O'REILLY, Colonel WILSON-PATTEN, Mr. DOWNING, Mr. CHARLES LEWIS, The O'DONOGHUE, Colonel VANDELEUR, Mr. M'MAHON, and Mr. BRVEN:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

And, on April 29, Colonel FORDE added, Lord CLAUD HAMILTON discharged.

BUILDING SOCIETIES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CROSS, Bill to amend the Law relating to Building Societies, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CROSS, Mr. GOURLEY, Mr. WALPOLE, Mr. GREGORY, Mr. TORRENS, and Mr. DODDS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 109.]

GRETTON CHAPEL MARRIAGES LEGALIZATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. YORKE, Bill for legalizing Marriages solemnized in Gretton Chapel, in the parish of Winchcomb, Gloucestershire, ordered to be brought in by Mr. YORKE and Mr. MONK.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 110.]

LAND RIGHTS AND CONVEYANCING (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GORDON, Bill to amend the Law relating to Land Rights, Conveyancing, and Deeds in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GORDON, Mr. CHARLES DALRYMPLE, and Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

BILL—(No. 45.)

REFERRED TO A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee (on Re-commitment), read.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, although I have given no Notice of Amendments on this Bill, I venture to take this opportunity of suggesting to my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack the expediency and advantage, as it seems to me, of passing this Bill in the first instance through a Select Committee. I have communicated my views on this subject to my noble Friend, and I have refrained from putting Amendments on the Paper lest it might be supposed that I desired to impede, much less endanger the measure. I have already had an opportunity of stating to your Lordships that in all that concerns its outline and its leading features, this Bill has my entire approval; and I should be sorry that anything should occur to endanger its passing in this present Session. But when the details of the measure are looked at it appears to me obvious that in discussing a Bill of this extent, and which deals with such a variety of subjects, there must arise from time to time differences in the arrangement on which a considerable amount of conversation will be necessary, and that this conversation must proceed very much on minute particulars. It appears to me equally obvious, therefore, that a Select Committee would be more fitted to deal with those questions than this House—in the first instance at all events. Without entering into any argument I will point out two matters on which I think there must be a considerable amount of minute discussion. One is the Schedule which contains the Code of Procedure to be introduced by the Bill. I think my noble and learned Friend informed your Lordships that this Schedule had been prepared under the very competent supervision of some gentlemen whose names he mentioned to your Lordships. I own the skill with which it has been prepared, but I must express my opinion that when it comes to be examined it is much more adapted to the plain and simple issues which arise in the Courts of Common Law than to the more complicated cases which arise in the Courts of Equity. That is a matter with respect to which, as I have already stated, I will not enter into any argument now; but if there is found to be considerable reason for the statement I have ventured to make on this point, the alteration which will have to be made in the Bill is one which can be better made in a Select Committee than in a Committee of the Whole House. The other matter is one which I have already mentioned to my noble and learned Friend in conversation. My noble and learned Friend, in composing the Supreme Court, has taken the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer, and through their Chiefs preserved their present names, while making them separate departments of the Supreme Court. I know this arrangement has been criticised in some quarters, but I believe my noble and learned Friend is right in what he has done. I quite agree with those who hold that there never can be a complete fusion of law and equity till the distinction between them is abolished; but, as regards the present day, I believe my noble and learned Friend is right in the course he has adopted. He has taken as large a step as can be taken at the present time. But he has adopted a course with regard to the Court of Chancery which to my mind requires consideration. The Bill proposes to make the Court of Chancery the Second Division of the Supreme Court; but the Lord Chancellor, who has hitherto been at the head of the Court of Chancery, is taken away from it altogether. This Division is to have the Master of the Rolls for its head, with the Vice-Chancellors and the Judge of the Court of Admiralty under him; so that the effect of this portion of the Bill will be to sever altogether the connection which has hitherto existed between the Lord Chancellor and the Court of Chancery, and which, it appears to me, has been the life and essence of that Court. This objection, even if it be well founded, does not impair the principle of the Bill; but at the same time the alterations which it would be necessary to make in regard to this matter, if my objection prevails, would be so much of changes of detail, and be so minute, that they again could be more conveniently dealt with by a Select Committee. I am anxious that there should be no delay. I hope there will be none. I hope that if the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, that Committee may meet immediately after the re-assembling of your Lordships, and that it may hold its sittings de die in diem; and if this course be adopted I think I am not too sanguine in saying that the whole work of the Select Committee may be concluded within a week. I may say that my noble and learned Friend Lord Westbury, who is suffering from acute illness and is unable to be in the House to-night, has communicated with me. Your Lordships will not be astonished to hear his great anxiety to take a part in the discussion of this measure, and he is extremely anxious, as I am, that it should be referred to a Select Committee, and if named on such a Committee he hopes to be able to serve. Under all the circumstances I have mentioned I hope my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack will adopt the suggestion of referring this Bill to a Select Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the mere fact that my noble and learned Friend who has just addressed your Lordships considers it the most advisable course to refer this Bill to a Select Committee goes very far indeed with me as a reason why that course should be adopted. Nothing is more desired by myself, and I think that probably nothing is more desired by your Lordships who feel the importance of this subject, than that what we do should be well done. I have no particular attachment to any matter of detail in this Bill, apart from the opinion I have formed that it tends to accomplish the object we all have in view. My noble and learned Friend has not only given an earnest, by the manner in which he has spoken on this subject on a former occasion, of his desire to accomplish this work in the best manner possible, but, as your Lordships are aware, he took an active part on the Royal Commission on whose first Report this Bill is mainly founded. I am bound also to say that while not indisposed to grapple in your Lordships' House with whatever difficulties may arise on the details of the measure, I am far from insensible of the convenience of dealing with the details of particular clauses in the manner my noble and learned Friend proposes. Hoping and believing that by this means we may have more fully than we otherwise should the benefit of the advice and assistance of my noble and learned Friend, and of other noble Lords both learned and not learned in the Law, and that as a result the Bill will go down stamped with more authority to to another place, I cheerfully accede to the suggestion of my noble and learned Friend. Your Lordships will, perhaps, allow me to say that while I entirely go with my noble and learned Friend in what he said as to the importance of the Rules of Procedure contained in the Schedule, and as to the improvements of which they may be susceptible, in order to meet the variety of cases with which we have to deal, I must reserve myself entirely on the other point raised by my noble and learned Friend. With respect to the future relations of the Lord Chancellor and the Court of Chancery, as at present advised, I am disposed to adhere to the provision in the Bill; but on that and every other subject I shall be glad to have an opportunity of exchanging opinions and reasons with those who may sit on the Select Committee. I believe the proper course will be for me to now move the discharge of the Order for going into Committee, with the view of moving subsequently that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. I therefore beg to move the discharge of the Order.

LORD DENMAN expressed his disapproval of the plan of abolishing the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House; and was as much opposed to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee as to a Committee of the whole House.

LORD REDESDALE said, he could not let the measure pass its present stage without making a few observations respecting it. He could not but think that the proposed abolition of the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House was a much more serious matter than many persons supposed, and that to interfere with that jurisdiction would be a very unwise step. In justice to the memory of Lord Lyndhurst, he thought it right to say that was the opinion of that noble and learned Lord. He had many conversations with him on the subject, and on one occasion in particular Lord Lyndhurst said to him—"Never consent to give up the jurisdiction of the House of Lords in appeals." It was sometimes contended that the Prerogative of their Lordships' House in this matter was only a name. Even if that were so, which was not the case, the same might be said of many other things which were conducive to feelings and results which it was very desirable to preserve. Why, for instance, if this House ceased to be a Court of Judicature should the decision on Impeachments be any longer referred to it? If it was to become a political and legislative Assembly only, why might not the House of Commons assert themselves equally qualified to exercise that jurisdiction? Why was that House asked to give up its jurisdiction as a Supreme Court of Appeal? Not because the House did not exercise that jurisdiction efficiently:—all the evidence given before the Committee which sat last year proved that as a Court of Appeal the House of Lords did its business in an efficient and a satisfactory manner. The Bill of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack reserved the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House for Scotland and Ireland. Why? Because it was believed that no other Court of Appeal that might be constituted would give equal satisfaction to suitors from those countries. A noble and learned Lord who spoke on the occasion of the second reading (Lord Cairns), suggested that, in certain cases, it might be desirable to give a further appeal from the first decision of the Appellate Court to be constituted under the Bill. Why should not their Appellate Jurisdiction be retained for such cases? If this were done their Lordships' House would continue to be the Supreme Court of Appeal. It was urged as an objection to the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords that it was competent to any lay Lord to come in and give his judgment on an appeal; but for a long time the practice had been to delegate the hearing and deciding of appeals to the Law Lords. The House at large ratified what they did. But, to remove the theoretical objection, the House might by formal order select certain members, the Law Lords, to hear and decide appeals. He believed the legal jurisdiction of their Lordships' House had arisen even before the constitution of Parliament itself. It was granted originally by Magna Charta, which provided that twenty-five Barons should be appointed to receive Petitions as to wrongdone, and that when complaint was made it should be referred for hearing to four of them.

Lord Redesdale

Afterwards, when such matters came to their Lordships' House, and down to the present day, Triers were appointed of Petitions from England and Ireland, and also Triers of Petitions from Gascony and other places beyond the sea. This was an old form; but it showed that from remote times the custom had been to appoint a select number of their Lordships' House to try appeals, the proceedings of which select number were ratified by the House. Another objection to the continuance of the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House was that the number of the Law Lords who heard appeals was too limited. To meet that objection, he himself so long back as 1851 gave Notice of an Address to the Crown for the summoning to that House of certain persons holding judicial offices. He thought that the Law, as well as the Church, should be represented in their Lordships' House, and his proposition was to have the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer called to it by Writ of Parliament or an Address to the Crown. The noble Marquess behind him (the Marquess of Salisbury), since the introduction of the Bill now before their Lordships, had given Notice of an Amendment having for its object the introduction into that House of the members of the Court of Appeal to be constituted by the Bill. He thought the proposition of the noble Marquess was open to an objection on a point of form, inasmuch as it did not propose to proceed by Address to the Crown. He also thought that the number it would introduce into their Lordships' House was too large. He thought his own plan that an Address should be presented to the Crown to call to the House certain professional Peers a preferable mode of proceeding, for he thought that the consent of the Crown should be first obtained. These, however, were not objections which need stand in the way of an addition to the power of their Lordships' House as a Court of Appeal, and he begged again to express an opinion that it would be unwise to part with their jurisdiction as the Supreme Court of Appeal.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he presumed that the fact of the Bill being sent to a Select Committee would not deprive him of the opportunity of bringing forward at a future stage the proposition of which he had given Notice, and to which his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees had just referred. In reply to the criticism of his noble Friend, he wished to observe that he did not think that the question of the number of legal officials that ought to be introduced into their Lordships' House affected the essence of his proposition; nor did he think the other matter—the Royal Prerogative—touched the principle. He had no wish to interfere with the Royal Prerogative, and a clause might be introduced providing that the fiat of Her Majesty should be necessary.

Motion agreed to; Bill referred to a Select Committee.

And, on Friday, April 3, the Lords following were named of the Committee.

THE BURIALS ACT—ANCIENT BURIAL-PLACE, PONTEFRACT.—QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to an alleged desecration of an ancient burial-place at Monkhill, Pontefract, where, it is stated, that human remains have been disinterred and carted away as rubbish, skulls and other bones being scattered about and made into lanterns and playthings by thoughtless boys; and, whether he has caused any inquiry to be made into the matter, or taken any steps to secure the re-interment of the remains thus disturbed?

MR. BRUCE; I received, Sir, a complaint from the Roman Catholic priest at Pontefract stating that a quantity of bones had been removed from what was supposed to be an ancient cemetery. I communicated with the local authorities as to the person who was charged with this desecration, and ordered them to inform him that if the place in question was actually a cemetery the offender rendered himself liable to be prosecuted for a misdemeanour, and to pecuniary penalties under the Burials Act, unless he was acting with a licence. The proceedings were stopped, and further inquiries were made, the result of which I have just received. From this it appeared that the land in question was bought by a gentleman at Pontefract, without any knowledge or suspicion that it had ever been a cemetery. Indeed, it appears to be very doubtful whether it ever was one. The ground was bought for building and garden purposes, and in clearing it for the foundation of a kiln, the workmen came across a considerable deposit not only of human bones, but also of bones of animals. The belief is that the former were the remains of persons killed during the siege of Pontefract during the Parliamentary wars. How that may be, it is impossible for me to say, but in the meantime no further removal of bones has taken place, and a policeman is stationed on the ground for the purpose of preventing desecration. Some skulls have been removed out of idle curiosity, but I have suggested that the bones already removed should be conveyed to the old churchyard and buried there.

ARMY—INDIA—MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BAZLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the new Army Medical Warrant will be applicable to the Medical Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army; and, if Medical Officers of the Indian Army who are now on sick leave in Europe, and receiving the old rate of English pay, will be granted the increased rate of pay from the date of the publication of the Warrant, viz. 1st of March, 1873?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to my hon. Friend, I have to state that the matter referred to in his first Question is now under consideration at the India Office and the War Office. In reply to his second Question, I have to say that it is not intended to make any change in the present rate of pay of officers in the Indian Medical Service.

RUSSIA—CENTRAL ASIA—THE KHIVA EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT MAHON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Government has declined to send the Military Attaché at St. Petersburg, or any other English Officer, to accompany the Khiva Expedition?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: It is true, Sir, that Her Majesty's Government do not intend sending either Captain Wellesley, the Military Attaché at St. Petersburg, or any other British Officer, to accompany the Expedition to Khiva.

SUPPLY.—QUESTION.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he was correctly understood to have stated that no Vote will be asked or Resolution proposed before the holidays which would affect the taxation of the coming financial year; and, whether he can state what will be the earliest day after the holidays upon which the proposals in the Budget will be taken into consideration.

MR. GLADSTONE in reply, said, that it was his intention to state the other evening that, although his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to make his annual financial statement on Monday next, the Government would not ask the House before the Easter recess to come to any decision which would in any manner bind the judgment of the House. As they were aware, it was a common thing to pass a Resolution of a formal character and, for a practical purpose, and he did not mean to say that some such Resolution might not be passed, but none would be proposed binding the House with reference to the future taxation of the year. He thought the most convenient day for practically considering the proposals of the Budget would be the 24th instant, the third day after the re-assembling of the House.

ARMY—THE 10TH HUSSARS.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will explain the circumstances under which the 10th Hussars were sent to India a few months ago without their Lieutenant Colonel; if such an arrangement is not extremely unusual; if the fact that the Lieutenant Colonel is only now gazetted out indicates that special leave was given him to remain at home to enable him to complete his period for retirement without going to India with his Regiment; and, if it is intended for the future to show the same consideration to all Officers, whatever their rank?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, when the 10th Hussars sailed for India it was in contemplation to submit to Her Majesty a new Royal Warrant, enabling the authorities to permit Lieutenant Colonels of regiments of sufficient service to retire to half-pay, on their own application, in the same way as under the new system Lieutenant Colonels appointed after the 31st of October, 1871, will retire compulsorily. The Lieutenant Colonel of the 10th Hussars had applied to retire, and it was intended to permit him to do so as soon as the Royal Warrant should have issued. The only effect of adopting any other course would have been that the public would have had to pay his passage out to India, and he would have been put to the expense of a return passage in a few weeks after his arrival in India. It is not true that the object of giving him special leave was to enable him to complete his service, since it had already been completed. The same circumstances cannot it is evident occur again.

PROFESSORSHIP OF PASTORAL THEOLOGY, OXFORD.—QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Regius Professorship of Pastoral Theology at the University of Oxford does not amount to about £1,500 a year; and if he will state on what grounds, and with respect to what qualifications, the Rev. E. King has been appointed by the Crown to that Chair?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he would not criticize the expression in the Question, or say whether it was quite accurate to speak of the "amount of the Professorship of Pastoral Theology;" but his hon. Friend had, as far as he knew, stated the Professor's income pretty correctly. It was, he believed, somewhere between £1,400 and £1,500 a-year; but, as his hon. Friend was of course aware, the Government had no official information of the value of the Canonry of Christ Church Cathedral, which was attached to the Professorship. With respect to the grounds and qualifications for the appointment, he could not very well distinguish between grounds and qualifications; but as to the qualifications, he had no difficulty in answering the Question. According to the best estimate which he could make of the character of the office, which was not a very general one, for it did not exist in many Universities; over and above the ordinary qualifications of a Professor of Theology, the Professor of Pastoral Theology had for his special functions to assist in forming pastoral habits and the pastoral character. It was a more personal charge than the other Professors of Divinity, and the gentleman appointed to such an office should be possessed of strong sympathies and of the power of exercising a healthy and beneficial influence over character; and from his experience, of some duration, he believed Mr. King was a gentleman who possessed those qualifications not only in an ordinary but in an eminent degree.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND)
—EXAMINATION OF TEACHERS.

QUESTION.

MR. GORDON asked the Vice President of the Privy Council, Why the Scotch Education Department of the Privy Council have not prepared and given notice of regulations in regard to the examination of teachers, in terms of the fifty-seventh section of the Act 35 and 36 Vic. c. 62, Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, which enacts—

"It shall be the duty of the Scotch Education Department immediately after the passing of this Act, and thereafter from time to time to make such regulations as they may see fit in regard to the time and manner, and the subjects of the examinations to be passed by such persons as desire to obtain a certificate of competency, and to regulate the conditions on which candidates may be admitted to examination, and the notice to be given thereof."

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the Education Department of the Privy Council have not yet issued the regulations in regard to the examination of teachers as contemplated by the section of the Act in question; and the reason why they have not done so is that it is inconvenient—I may say useless—to issue such regulations until it has been determined what change should be made in the conditions of the Parliamentary Grant to Scotch Schools, that is, till the New Code for Scotland has been issued. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may be aware that the Education Department have no power to issue such Code until they have received suggestions from the Scotch Education Board, which suggestions have not yet been received.

EAST INDIA—(FINANCIAL STATEMENT).—RESOLUTION.

MR. FAWCETT presented Petitions from Bombay and Calcutta on the subject of the Indian Budget. On the Motion of Mr. Fawcett, the Petition from Calcutta, which came from the British Indian Association, was read by the clerk at the Table. It prayed that the House might be pleased to pass a Resolution requiring that the Indian Financial Statement should be brought forward at an earlier period of the Session.

MR. R. N. FOWLER: Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the Petitions my hon. Friend has just presented, I rise to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Statement of the Financial Affairs of India should be made at a period of the Session when it can be fully discussed."

Sir, I wish to recall to the recollection of the House the circumstances under which the Indian Financial Statement was brought forward last Session. It was submitted at a morning sitting on the 6th of August, the prorogation taking place on the 10th. On that occasion my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India made his statement in a speech of two hours' duration, distinguished by his usual eloquence and great knowledge of Indian affairs. He was followed by my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), who spoke for two hours and a-half, and whose speech, considering the physical difficulties under which he laboured, and the columns of figures and long quotations which it contained, was one of the greatest intellectual efforts which I ever had the good fortune to hear and which, I believe, was ever witnessed in this House. I do not complain of the length of those speeches, on the contrary, having listened attentively to both, I believe that not a word could have been advantageously omitted from either; but if the two introductory speeches could occupy four hours and a-half, it is obviously impossible that such a debate could be advantageously got through in a morning sitting, or in any one sitting of the House. In fact, the hon. Member for Brighton had not concluded his speech when the morning sitting came to an end, and the Government were obliged to allow the debate to be renewed after the business fixed for the evening sitting. What was the result? Several hon. Members who generally took part in discussions relating to India were not present, and my right hon. Friend the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote) was compelled, I know most reluctantly, to leave London before the debate came on. Can justice be done to the great interests of India in that way? When, in 1858, the power of the Government of India was taken away from the East India Company and was transferred to the Crown, it was understood that the Eastern Empire would receive greater attention at the hands of Parliament. They had that morning read a Bill a second time (East India Stock Dividend Redemption Bill), the object of which was finally to extinguish that ancient and historical corporation, the East India Company; and at the time when its political powers were vested in the Crown the leaders on both sides said that great advantage would arise from giving greater attention to the affairs of India. Lord Palmerston, in a speech on introducing the Government of India Bill, said—

"However, we shall be told by some that the Government of India is a great mystery—that the unholy ought not to set foot in that temple—that the House of Commons should be kept aloof from any interference in Indian affairs—that if we transfer the Government to the Ministers responsible to Parliament, we shall have Indian affairs made the subject and plaything of party passions in this House, and that great mischief would arise therefrom. I think that argument is founded on an overlooking of the fundamental principles of the British constitution. It is a reflection on the Parliamentary government. Why, Sir, what is there in the management of India which is not mainly dependent on those general principles of statesmanship, which men in public life in this country acquire here, and make the guidance of their conduct. I do not think so ill of this House as to imagine that it would be disposed, for factious purposes, or for the momentary triumph of party, to trifle with the great interests of the country as connected with the administration of our Indian affairs. I am accustomed to think that the Parliament of this country does comprise in itself as much administrative ability, and as much statesmanlike knowledge and science as are possessed by any number of men in any other country whatever; and I own, with all respect for the Court of Directors, that I cannot bring myself to think that the Parliament of England is less capable of wisely administering the great affairs of State in connection with India than the Court of Directors in Leadenhall Street. I am not afraid to trust Parliament with an insight into Indian affairs. I believe, on the contrary, that if things have not gone on so fast in India as they might have done—if the progress of improvement has been somewhat slower than might have been expected, that effect has arisen from the circumstance that the public of England at large were wholly ignorant of Indian affairs, and had turned away from them, being daunted by the complications they imagined them to be involved in; and because Parliament has never had face to face, in this and the other House, men personally and entirely responsible for the administration of Indian affairs. No doubt a good deal has been done in the way of substantial improvement of late years, but that which has been done I may venture to say has been entirely the result of debates in this and the other House of Parliament. And, so far from any discussion on India having worked evil in India, I believe that the greater part of those improvements which the East India Directors boast of in that publication which has lately issued from Leadenhall Street, has been the result of pressure on the Indian administration by debates in Parliament and discussions in the public Press. Therefore, so far from being alarmed at the consequences which may arise from bringing Indian affairs under the cognizance of Parliament, I believe that a great benefit to India, and through India to the British nation, will result therefrom."—[3 Hansard, cxlviii. 1290.]

Mr. R. N. Fowler

Lord Palmerston's view evidently was that Indian affairs might with advantage be more discussed in the House than they had previously been, and that view was endorsed by what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) called an "overwhelming majority;" the majority being 145, or 318 against 173. The argument brought forward by the East India Company, whose defence was conducted by a very eminent Gentleman still spared to this House, my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) was, that if the Company were abolished India would become the battle-ground of party in this House. The hon. Gentleman said, at the conclusion of a very eloquent speech—

"Above all, it relates the history of a Government which did not destroy the population of the territory which it acquired, but won their respect and gratitude. God grant that the continuation of that history may present as bright or brighter pages! but let it not have to record that, at a moment of great trouble, the English Minister of the day to the difficulties of an unextinguished Mutiny added the uncertainties of a change of Government; let it not record that an English Parliament, guided by a public opinion which was ignorant of Indian affairs, imperilled an empire by its rash legislation; and, above all, let it not record that, by an act of this House, the fairest dominion of the Queen was converted into the shuttlecock of party."—[3 Hansard, cxlviii. 1304.]

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire on a subsequent evening of the debate attributed the indifference with which Indian matters were treated in the House of Commons to the circumstance that the House was not responsible for the finances of India, and made use of the following words:—

"We have heard over and over again in this House that India never could command attention here—that so long as there was a debate on India it was impossible to make or keep a House, and that it was a subject—however great its magnitude and vast and varied its details, in which Englishmen would never take an interest. I think, Sir, there is a very simple and satisfactory reason for conduct which I cannot say is much to our honour, and for circumstances which I own are somewhat humiliating."—[3 Hansard, cxlviii. 1708.]

The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to give as a reason that the House was not responsible for the finances of India. Within a few days after that debate the Government of Lord Palmerston was defeated and retired, being succeeded by the Government of Lord Derby, in which the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire filled the office of Leader of the House of Commons. That Government passed a Bill, transferring the Government of India from the Company to the Crown, in treating of which Lord Derby spoke as follows in a debate in the other House of Parliament:—

"This Bill does not pretend to deal with all those complicated and difficult questions which will, no doubt, within the next few years frequently engage the anxious consideration of Parliament and of the country. It does not pretend to deal with the revenue, with the finance, with the land regulations, with the condition of the natives, and the possibility of extending their admission into the public service."—[3 Hansard, cli. 1448.]

Sir, I think it is evident from the extracts which I have read that it was contemplated by the leaders of parties of that day that if the Government of India were transferred to the Crown, India would receive a greater amount of attention at the hands of Parliament. Sir, how has that pledge given by the Leaders, and endorsed by an enormous majority of the House, been redeemed? It had previously been the practice to put off the Indian Budget to the end of the Session, and after the power was transferred to the Crown it might well have been expected that a new system would be adopted; but the House will see from the dates on which the Indian Budget was introduced between 1855 and 1870, that the practice still continued of bringing it forward at the close of the Session. Under the old system, the right hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Vernon Smith) brought it forward on August 7, 1855; and again on July 21, 1856; while, in 1857, the right hon. Gentleman, in answer to the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone (Lord Claud Hamilton), said he should make no statement on account of the Mutiny. Under the new system, it was brought forward by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Halifax (Sir Charles Wood), on August 1, 1859, the Prorogation occurring on August 13—a period of 12 days; again on August 13, 1860, the Prorogation occurring on August 28—a period of 15 days; again on July 25, 1861, the Prorogation occurring on August 6—a period of 12 days; again on July 17, 1862, the Prorogation occurring on August 7—a period of 21 days; again on July 23, 1863, the Prorogation occurring on July 28—a period of 5 days; again on July 21, 1864, the Prorogation occurring on July 29—a period of 8 days; again on June 29, 1865, the Prorogation occurring on July 6—a period of 8 days; by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranborne), on July 19, 1866, the Prorogation occurring on August 10—a period of 22 days; by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), on August 12, 1867, the Prorogation occurring on August 21—a period of 9 days; again on July 27, 1868, the Prorogation occurring on July 31—a period of 4 days; by the hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant-Duff), on August 3, 1869, the Prorogation occurring on August 11—a period of 8 days; and again on August 5, 1870, when the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), moved an Amendment—

"That this House regrets that the Indian Budget is introduced at so late a period of the Session, and is of opinion, considering the present position of Indian Finance, that it would be expedient to appoint a Select Committee early next Session to inquire into the administration of the finances of India."—[3 Hansard, ccciii. 1599.]

—this Amendment was withdrawn, and the House agreed to the Resolutions—the Prorogation occurring on August 10—a period of 5 days. I venture to submit that to postpone so important a debate until the "dog days," is not creditable to the conduct of Business in this House. I may be told that it is impossible to get an earlier day; but I venture to think that it would be better to have a satisfactory debate on incomplete Returns, than an unsatisfactory debate on Returns which have been completed. Hon. Members have seen in the newspapers telegrams from India of the announcement of Sir Richard Temple's Budget. I think there could be no difficulty in bringing forward the Budget shortly after Whitsuntide. At all events, a matter of such deep importance deserves some sacrifice of the time of the House. I can but think that in putting off the debate to the end of the Session the House is neglecting its duty. Members of this House are trustees of the people of India. Our Indian subjects are not a people who can be entrusted with representative institutions; and it is on that account the duty of England to see that the interests of India are properly looked after. We must all rejoice that the apprehension of the distinguished advocate of the East India Company that India would become the shuttlecock of party has not been realized; but at the same time we must all deplore that this House has not taken a calm and dispassionate interest in the affairs of the greatest dependency any nation ever possessed. I cordially agree with the hon. Member for Brighton that there is no responsibility presses more strongly on a Member of this House than the responsibility he owes to the people of India. It seems to me to be a discredit and a reproach to Parliament that the affairs of India should be discussed by a jaded and exhausted House in the last days of an expiring Session, and entertaining this belief I venture, humbly but earnestly, to commend to the House the Resolution which stands in my name.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN: * In seconding the Resolution of my hon. Friend opposite, I shall confine my remarks to one or two points, as to which this House appears to be specially responsible for the finances of India, and upon which our influence may be most legitimately exercised. There are, of course, many important questions of Indian administration, which it is impossible for persons resident in this country fully to comprehend, which must be left in the hands of the Government in India, and in connection with which Parliament will show its wisdom by interfering as little as possible. But as regards finance, this is far from being the case, and it is to Parliament alone that India can look for any check upon those large items of expenditure which are under the immediate control of the India Office, or for any relief to the Indian treasury from charges which ought to be borne wholly or in part by the Imperial Exchequer. Apart from all other ways in which the British Parliament may afford protection to the unrepresented people of India, it is the duty of this House to inquire thoroughly into these two branches of Indian financial administration, and to exercise the control which it alone has the power of exercising over the Secretary of State for India. In petitioning Parliament, great stress has been laid by the Natives upon these two points—namely, first, the disposal of the revenues of India by the authorities in England; secondly, the adjustment of the financial relations between England and India upon a fair and equitable footing. In a Petition presented in May, 1871, to this House from the Bombay Association—a society composed entirely of Native gentlemen—the earnest attention of Parliament is invited to these topics, and “the immense increase which has taken place during the last 13 years in the amount of disbursements made in England out of the revenues of India by H. M. Secretary of State in Council” is assigned as one of the principal causes to which must be ascribed the large deficits in the Indian Exchequer from 1864 to 1870. For this result Parliament cannot be held free from responsibility. Then, again, items of expenditure, which ought to have been provided for entirely from the Imperial Exchequer, or equably distributed, have been entirely defrayed by India, and it is urged that Parliament should fairly apportion the cost of maintaining the connection between the two countries, India having cost Great Britain nothing either for her acquisition or defence. The attention of the House is directed to one more topic of great importance with which Parliament alone is competent to deal. The Bombay Association asserts that if Parliament were to give an Imperial guarantee for the Indian public debt, and convert it into consols, an immediate reduction might be effected in the rate of interest to the amount of £1,500,000 sterling, without any real burden being cast upon the Imperial Exchequer, and that this sum might be applied as a sinking fund to the complete extinction of the debt. It is an open question, upon which I will now venture no opinion, as to how far this country would be morally bound, in case of necessity, to make good the public debt of India. By many the moral obligation is held to be so strong that the concession of a legal guarantee would not practically increase our liability, while it would effect a great immediate saving to India, which would also benefit from the increased vigilance likely to be exercised in such a case by this House over the finances of our Eastern Empire. At the present time, moreover, a new danger to Indian finance has to be guarded against. The decentralization scheme has been fairly inaugurated, and a large additional share of administrative power, both in levying and expending money, has been conferred upon local governments. Great advantages were anticipated from this scheme as to economy, besides the development of municipal institutions, and the association of Natives in the administration. These hopes have been as yet very imperfectly realized, and it is complained that in certain cases these powers have been exercised to the detriment of the people, resulting merely in the imposition of new and vexatious taxes. In particular by the “Non-agricultural cess” in Bombay, the policy of the Imperial Government was reversed, and an income tax was imposed, which included those whose incomes reached £5 a-year, a sum implying great poverty even in India. It is, in fact, a sort of graduated poll-tax—the power of determining the class in which any individual is to be included being left to the Government assessors, whereby the door is opened to the grossest corruption and oppression. The estimated return from this tax was only £45,000, to be paid by about 500,000 people; and, although an appeal for exemption might be made to a European official, this involved a stamp equal at least in value to the minimum amount of the tax. All that can be said against an income tax applies with threefold force to such an impost as this, which is indeed in abeyance, but appears to be unrepealed, so that its machinery is at any moment available if required. I lay the more stress on it now, because being provincial, it finds no place in the financial statement laid before this House, and might altogether escape notice in England. In the opinion of the Natives the decentralization system is likely to produce many new local burdens, and many European officials share this view, holding that nothing will require to be more carefully watched than the tendency to grave abuses involved in such a system. There will always be a risk of the local authorities repeating, for purposes perhaps excellent in themselves, those petty but vexatious taxes formerly imposed under native rule. In the time of the Peishwa, no less than 29 cesses were levied in addition to the land tax, and although all have been abolished as Imperial taxes, some have been already re-established for municipal purposes. The fact is that publicity is above all things required in Indian administration; the Indian Council deliberates with closed doors; the proceedings of the Indian Finance Committee attract no attention in this country, although eagerly scanned in India. By discussion in this House alone can such publicity be given as may educate British opinion, and may satisfy India that her interests are being watched over. It is a question of Imperial policy to strengthen in every way the belief that this House is a true court of appeal against fiscal oppression, the worst evil with which India is now menaced. Once only during the whole Session does Government direct the attention of Parliament to Indian affairs, and it is idle to tell us that so many more important matters are pressing upon us that only in August, or late in July, can a few hours be spared for a weary remnant to discuss this vital question of Indian finance. When the Indian Budget is the subject of debate, there are hardly over 40 Members present, but possibly all are present who take an interest in the question. It is true that India has never been made "the shuttlecock of party," but greatly as she has gained by this exemption, it has caused her also to suffer neglect. Even if her sense of neglect be to a certain extent a sentimental grievance, it is not the less keenly felt. The Petitions to-day presented from Calcutta and Bombay show the importance attached by the Natives to a full discussion of their affairs in this House, and, believing their demands to be just and reasonable, I have great pleasure in seconding this Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Statement of the Financial Affairs of India should be made at a period of the Session when it can be fully discussed."—
(Mr. Robert Fowler.)

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, that the Amendment of which he had given Notice was not in spirit adverse to the Motion of the hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. R. N. Fowler). He concurred in thinking it highly desirable that the Indian Budget should be brought in at an earlier day, but thought that the object would be more effectually attained by an Amendment of which he had himself given Notice. The Prime Minister stated in 1870 that the pressure upon the Government during the months of April, May, and June was such that they could not afford time for the discussion of the Indian Budget at that period of the year. The right hon. Gentleman at the same time admitted that the present practice was not satisfactory. It therefore became a question whether it would not be possible to enable the Indian accounts to come to this country early in the spring. It was by no means indispensable that they should continue to be made up to the 31st of March; but as long as that was done it was better to discuss Indian finances at the end of the Session than at the beginning, because otherwise the House would have to discuss the subject in the absence of the statement of the Financial Member of the Council, which was made in the last days of March or the first week in April. If the House discussed the finance of India in the absence of that speech and of any reliable accounts for the current year, or any estimate for the ensuing year, there would be no data before them for discussion. If, on the other hand, the Indian financial year which now terminated on the 31st of March were changed to the 31st of December, then the Indian Finance Minister could make his statement by the 10th of January, all the necessary documents would be sent home and printed by the end of February, and any day before the 10th of March might be fixed for the Indian Budget. It was said that this change would not harmonize with the land revenue accounts; but the present financial year did not correspond with the agricultural year, nor was it necessary that it should do so. He earnestly pressed this matter upon the attention of the House, because it appeared to him they had the remedy very much in their own hands. It was impossible, however, to enter into all the details of the proposed change on the present occasion it being a question eminently for examination and report by a Select Committee. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. KINNAIRD seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on East India Finance to consider and report whether the Indian Financial year which now terminates on the 31st March, should be altered to the year ending on the 31st December, in order that the Secretary of State for India may be enabled to make his Financial Statement to the House before the Easter Recess," — (Sir Charles Wingfield.)

—instead thereof.

MR. EASTWICK said, he supposed the Resolution of the hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. R. N. Fowler) would be generally acceptable to the House. Hon. Members who took an interest in Indian affairs would be glad to have the financial statement made at a period when their energies were fresh and when it could be properly discussed. They would be glad, too, that there should be no ground left for the offensive imputation that that House was indifferent to the affairs and interests of India. It should, however, be remembered that the time for closing the accounts of the year was changed—no longer back than in 1866—from the 30th of April to the 31st of March. That change entailed immense trouble on the financial department in India, which was always a hard-worked Department. We might be sure that this second change would also entail trouble and would cause considerable dissatisfaction and some expense, while it would likewise disarrange our statistics. We had already a year of 11 months to break our calculations, and now we should have in addition a year of nine months, so that it would be extremely difficult to make comparative statements, or draw deductions from averages. These, however, were small matters in comparison with mischiefs which might arise from the change, owing to its being inconvenient to get in revenue balances at that particular period or its offending the religious prejudices of the natives to do so for some reason or other which no Englishman would ever suspect. Whether this might happen or not was more than he could undertake to affirm until he had heard exhaustive evidence on the subject. His impression at present was that, so far as the natives were concerned, they might close the financial year in December just as well as in March. At the same time we should, of course, lay ourselves open to the objection—"Begin at home." Why, indeed, should we make this change in India and not in this country? But whatever evils this change, if it were adopted, might remedy, it was certain that it could possibly do nothing to remedy what was the greatest difficulty of all as regarded Indian accounts, and that was their overwhelming unmanageableness, owing to the vast extent of the Empire. If Bengal, the Panjáb, Bombay, and Madras were separate States with separate finance, then, of course, we might really look for something like accuracy in the Indian accounts. Before he sat down he would express a hope that, whether in this debate or in any other on Indian questions, the habit of making sharp criticisms on the action of the Indian Government would be avoided as much as possible. It was his belief that disaffection was bred and fed in India by the unpatriotic and offensive language of our own countrymen as much as by any other thing whatever. As a specimen he would, with the permission of the House, read one passage from a most mischievous and seditious article which appeared in The Calcutta Review for October, 1872. After sneering at our Government, and calumniating it in every possible way, the writer said—

"The fact is, the English Dominion of India is a waste of power injurious to the English taxpayer as well as to the Indian. At the same time, inasmuch as the British taxpayer has the option of terminating the arrangement, while the Indian taxpayer, although the poorer, has no choice whatever in the matter, the former deserves little pity for his own folly, but the latter merits the deepest sympathy for his helpless plight. In our own coming season of English tribulation, with its reckoning of 200 millions of discredited Indian securities, when the helm of the State shall have fallen from the incompetent hands of rhetorical drivellers, may the ranks of the English people yield a ruler with the fearlessness of Delesscluze, and a financier with the rectitude of Jourde."

All he could say was that if the Government chose to appoint a magistrate and collector to preach sedition in Orissa, they had no right to blow ignorant ryots away from guns for responding to his appeal.

MR. DENISON merely wished to say that had the Amendment been an abstract Resolution for altering the date of the financial year he could not have supported it. It could not have failed to strike anybody who had listened to this and similar debates that this matter was discussed solely from an English point of view, and without the slightest regard to the feelings or the convenience of the people of India or the Indian authorities. The object of the proposed change was simply to allow certain discussions to take place at a period of the year most convenient to the House. He did not think that a sufficient reason for making the change without reference to the Indian authorities. The change which had already been made, and which was now only of five years standing, had created great inconvenience and disturbance. The 31st of December was a time when every executive officer in charge of a district was out in camp looking after the interests of his district, and when the Governor General, if he was on a tour, was absent from the seat of government. He did not find any fault with the Amendment which proposed that the Committee now sitting should take evidence on the point, but he protested against changes being made simply to meet a temporary inconvenience to the House. A subject of this importance ought to be deliberately considered, and if the proposed instruction were given to the Committee they might take evidence on the point, and would not come to any hasty or violent decision on a matter of such very great importance. In his judgment, the convenience of India, and of those who administered the government of India, ought to be the primary consideration in deciding this question, and not simply the convenience of this House.

MR. KINNAIRD agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that the object the House ought to have in view was the convenience and benefit of the Indian Empire. He was of opinion that the question should be referred to the Committee upstairs, which was now engaged in considering the subject of Indian Finance.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he questioned the advisability of referring the question to the Committee upstairs. He would remind the hon. Member that that Committee were already charged with a very heavy task. The present was the third Session of their sitting, and it was by no means clear that they could terminate their inquiry within the limits of the present Session. Looking at the question simply from an English point of view, it would, of course, be easy for the Committee to discuss it and make recommendations; but the paramount question after all was, what would be most convenient for India, and probably upon that point they would have to take evidence from India. The more reasonable course to adopt would be to affirm the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Penryn (Mr. R. N. Fowler), and to remit to the India Office and Council the question whether it was desirable to make any change in the time at which the Indian financial year should close. The Motion, in point of fact, contained a truism which he hoped the House would not hesitate to affirm. Although at one time he had thought that the Indian financial year should be closed on the 31st of December, he confessed that more recent information had led him to doubt whether that change would put the Indian Government to an amount of inconvenience which would not be compensated by the convenience which that House would gain by it. At all events, he believed that this matter would be better undertaken by the Secretary of State himself than by the Committee upstairs, whose hands were already full. One advantage resulting from such discussions as the present was to show the people of India, and those who were interested in India, that there was more difficulty in the matter than was apparent at first sight, and that it was not from any indifference to Indian interests, but owing to the practical difficulty of getting through the business which the House must dispose of, that this scandal—for such he did not hesitate to say it was—annually occurred. On the other hand, it must be borne in mind that the discussion of the Indian Budget was not like the practical work of legislation, for the House had only to receive a statement, ask questions, and talk about it. It would, he thought, be better for the Government to face the matter boldly, and even in the midst of the Business of the House to set apart a day early in July for the bringing on of the Indian Budget, as they could do so then more conveniently than at the end of the Session. With respect to the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield), he hoped that by referring the question to the Select Committee the House would not add another to the straws which were already breaking the camel's back.

the weight of the straw which broke the camel's back upstairs, but did not seem to be equally conscious as to the weight of the straw which broke the camel's back downstairs. His right hon. Friend thought it an easy matter for the Government to find a day in the beginning of July, as compared with an earlier and later period of the Session, but that was not his experience. They were told the Motion of the hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. R. N. Fowler) was a truism, and that therefore it was desirable to place it upon record. But there were a great number of plain and undeniable truths in reference to the conduct of the Business of the House which were full of weight and importance, but which it would be most inexpedient to place upon record. For example, every year many measures which it was desirable should be carried remained unpassed. If an hon. Member were to move that it was of great importance that those measures should on the following year be adopted by the House of Commons and sent to the other House, that would be a truism, but one which it would be impolitic to record on the Votes of the House, and for this reason that the House ought not to record opinions which did not carry in themselves some operative principle—in other words, which did not tend to their own fulfilment. He wished, however, to meet the hon. Member as far as possible. The present year was not, perhaps, so much pressed with measures of the greatest importance as some years had been, and might afford them an opportunity of seeing whether in the months immediately before the last weeks of the Session, and before the attendance of hon. Members began to thin, they could not find a day for the discussion of the Indian Budget. He was willing to pledge himself to make that effort. It should be remembered that the Indian Budget must be taken on a Government night, as private Members, whether specially interested in India or not, were usually unwilling to give way and allow it to take the place of their own business. But the Government nights were spent in discussing questions which led to immediate and practical issues, in making progress with Bills or Votes; and, as a rule, it would not be found practicable to put aside those practical issues and the making of progress with the Votes in order to introduce a discussion which did not lead to an operative vote. He could not therefore concur in the opinion expressed by his right hon. Friend that the Resolution of the hon. Member for Penryn, which could not lead to any operative result, should be recorded on the Votes of the House. To refer the question to the Committee was a practical and, he thought, a fair proposal. If the Committee found they could not deal with it without taking evidence from India, they might discharge themselves of so serious an element of inquiry and recommend that it should receive the consideration of the Executive. On one point, which was of great importance, they were all agreed—namely, that the whole question at issue was for the benefit and advantage of India. It was not connected with the advantage of this country, or the comfort or convenience of Members of the House. What was desirable was that the discussion of the Indian Budget should be taken at such a time of the Session as was likely to be most conducive to the interests of India, and that time would, he thought, be found at the outset of the Session. He did not hesitate to affirm that the first two or three weeks of the Session constituted the period during which it was easiest to secure a considerable attendance of hon. Members. He did not think it would be possible to obtain a large attendance of hon. Members upon the Indian Budget late in the Session; but at the beginning of the Session there was a sort of freshness, and renovated zeal, and appetite for work among them which would really give a fair prospect, or the best prospect of a good attendance. He doubted whether the Under Secretary of State would not find it difficult to keep a House for the purpose even in May or June. There were thus two questions for consideration—first, the time at which the Indian Budget could be most advantageously discussed in this House; secondly, the best re-arrangement of the financial year in India. It would not be unreasonable to refer these points to the Committee, who would either point out the best way in which an investigation might be made, or would give a weighty judgment which he thought the House would be disposed to confirm. Holding this view, he was in favour of the Amendment. Meanwhile, he repeated that he had no wish to thwart, but, on the contrary, wished to forward, the reasonable object which the hon. Member opposite had in view. He did not, however, believe that the mere record of a truism would answer any useful purpose; and, on the part of the Government, he engaged during the present year to make the experiment of appointing the discussion upon the Indian Budget at an earlier period than usual, when hon. Members would not be drawn away from town by other attractions or necessities. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with this assurance; but if the vote of the House were taken, he should certainly vote for the Amendment.

Mr. FAWCETT admitted that the assurance of the Prime Minister, that he would endeavour to bring forward the Indian Budget at an earlier period this Session, was satisfactory as far as it went; but it did not appear to him to supply any valid reason why the hon. Member for Penryn should refrain from asking the House to express an opinion upon his Motion. He should vote for the Motion rather than the Amendment, because the Amendment, though not inconsistent with the Motion, took off the House upon a side issue. All the Motion did was to affirm the necessity of discussing the Indian Budget earlier than usual, and if the Committee decided that the Indian financial year should end December 31st, and that the Budget should be discussed here before Easter, the two things would not be inconsistent. The Prime Minister had enlarged upon the disadvantage of placing abstract Resolutions upon the records of the House. As an independent Member he looked upon abstract Resolutions from a different point of view. On some occasions he had withdrawn abstract Resolutions after proposing them, and he had never done so without regretting their withdrawal. On other occasions, when he had pressed abstract Resolutions, and they had been accepted by the House, they had proved fruitful of good. What was the objection to place the Motion of the hon. Member for Penryn on the records of the House? It would be an instruction to the present and to successive Governments—which could not be lightly disregarded by them—that the House of Commons desired the Indian Budget to be brought forward at a time when it might be properly discussed. No doubt it was difficult for the Government to provide a night for the Indian Budget, and for that very reason the House should declare that a night must be provided, so as to prevent the discontent which now existed in India, because the House of Commons frequently acted as though it wished to treat the affairs of India with intentional contempt. Two years ago a promise was given that an effort should be made to introduce the Indian Budget at an earlier period, but what happened last year? Why, last year the Indian Financial Statement had not even a day at the end of the Session. All that was vouchsafed was a morning sitting. At that morning sitting the speech of the Under Secretary of State for India occupied three hours and a-half out of the five hours. His own remarks occupied the end of the sitting, and were unfinished at the Adjournment; and when the House resumed, but for the accident that the Amendments to the Licensing Bill had not been printed, there would have been only a speech and a-half upon the Indian Budget, and there would not have been any other opportunity for the conclusion of his own speech, or for any remarks by the 15 or 20 other hon. Gentlemen who wished to take part in the discussion. Such a state of things was a scandal, and it produced the worst possible impression in India. He was speaking within the mark when he said that he had received ten times as many letters respecting the way in which the discussion on the Indian Budget was treated last year than he had on any other subject connected with the affairs of that great Dependency. The right hon. Gentleman said the discussion on the Indian Budget was not practically operative like a Bill. In one sense this was true, but in another sense it was far from true. Many Bills produced no practical effect, whereas every moment given to the affairs of India produced results of the highest importance, and was warmly appreciated by the people of India. Parliament had no power to alter the Indian Budget, nevertheless, the people of India looked to Parliament as the final arbiter of their destinies, and they knew that if in a full House a strong opinion was expressed upon a tax or upon expenditure, no Secretary of State or Governor General could disregard such an opinion. He hoped his hon. Friend would not be satisfied with the promise which had been given to him by the Prime Minister, and which, no doubt, would be faithfully carried out so far as this Session was concerned. He hoped his hon. Friend would ask the House to express its opinion on this Motion. Let the House, at any rate, tell the people of India that if the Indian Budget should again be brought forward at the fag-end of a Session at a morning sitting the independent Members could point to a Resolution which they had put on the records of the House for the purpose of protesting against the Indian Budget being brought forward at a period of the Session when it was impossible that the important matters it contained could be adequately discussed, or the affairs of our great dependency could be treated with that respect which they so eminently deserved.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had repeated a statement which he had heard before, and which he felt it his duty to correct. The hon. Member had said that in laying the Indian Budget before the House in August last, he (Mr. Grant Duff) spoke three hours and a-half. Now, the truth of the matter was that he rose a few minutes after 3 o'clock and sat down a little after 5 o'clock, and during about half-an-hour of the time, between 3 and 5 o'clock, the House was in attendance in "another place" while the Royal Assent was being given to Bills; so that, instead of speaking three hours and a-half, he spoke very little more, if more, than an hour and a-half. When the hon. Member for Brighton complained that the promise given by the Government, in 1870, that the Indian Budget should be brought in earlier in 1871 was not kept, he must have forgotten that on the 24th of February in the year 1871, he (Mr. Grant Duff) did make a statement, although it was impossible at that early period to lay before the House exactly what was known as the Indian Budget. If it were possible, the Representative of the Indian Government in the House of Commons would wish to bring forward the Indian Budget about the second or third week of June; but it had been proved again and again by the experience of every Administration that had ever existed since there was an Indian Budget, that the House would not, under any consideration, give up a day at that time for the discussion of Indian affairs unless they were of the greatest possible urgency, such as those which occurred in 1857. The Government, therefore, had these alternatives—either they must bring forward the Indian Budget early in the Session, as they did in 1871, with imperfect documents, or they must bring it forward as they did now at the end of the Session. The only other course was to alter the Indian financial year. But any change would cause considerable inconvenience; and the only practical course seemed to be to adopt the suggestion for referring the matter to the Financial Committee now sitting. They would be able to examine a former Viceroy, two finance Ministers, and other witnesses, and, doubtless, would be able to make some reasonable proposition to the House.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he could not accept the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, because they must have regard not merely to the present year but to the action of future Governments, and as he thought those who felt strongly upon the subject ought to protest against the present system, he must press his Motion to a division.

The House divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 130: Majority 41.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on East India Finance to consider and report whether the Indian Financial year which now terminates on the 31st March, should be altered to the year ending on the 31st December, in order that the Secretary of State for India may be enabled to make his Financial Statement to the House before the Easter Recess.

VALUATION DEPARTMENT (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

THE O'CONOR DON rose to call attention to the evidence of the Commissioners of Valuation in Ireland which had been given before a Committee of that House, and to move a Resolution to the effect that the present constitution of the Irish Valuation Department was unsatisfactory, and that it was desirable that an experienced and competent officer should be placed at its head. He frankly admitted that his present motion, if carried, would practically be a Vote of Censure on the gentleman at the head of the Irish Valuation Department. Mr. Greene, the individual to whom he referred, had been examined before a Committee of that House, and the evidence he had then given had proved him not to be a fit person to be at the head of an important public Department. When he had brought this subject under the notice of the House two years ago the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Baxter) admitted that various abuses existed in relation to it—that counties had been wrongly charged, that the expenditure in the office was extravagant, that there was no efficient control over it, and that the accounts were in a muddle. The right hon. Gentleman, while refusing to assent to the re-appointment of the Committee to inquire into the matter which was then asked for, had promised to take steps to bring about a reform in the Department, but that promise had not been fulfilled, nor was it possible with the present administration of the office. Mr. Greene, who had been for 23 years the practical head of the Department, had been unable to give any detailed evidence before the Committee as to the principle upon which the Townland valuation had been conducted; and he admitted that although the whole of Ireland, with the exception of six counties, had been valued during the time he was in office, he had never read the Townland Valuation Act. The result of the mismanagement of the service up to the present was that instead of the valuation costing one half-penny per acre, the amount of the original estimate, it had cost 6d. per acre, altogether amounting to £325,000, which had to be paid by the counties of Ireland. His right hon. Friend, in introducing his Bill the other evening, stated that a new valuation was necessary in Ireland, because the old had been made at a time when taxes were very high. It was the fact, however, that the taxes had never in any regular form affected the valuation. The evidence of the Commissioner on this point was confused, contradictory, and unintelligible, and in support of his statement that the rate of local taxation had been deducted from the gross value, he was unable to adduce any documentary proof. His right hon. Friend went on to say that the new valuation would apply only to three Provinces; but why a distinction was to be made between Ulster and the rest of Ireland he was at a loss to know. The statements of the Commissioner of Valuations on the subject betrayed, he thought, an extraordinary want of knowledge. But there was a more serious charge against him. There was in Ireland each year what was called a revision of the valuation, which consisted in ascertaining the change of occupancy in the land between one year and another. That work of revision cost £25,000, but on investigation before the Committee it turned out that only about £10,000 or £12,000 of that sum was spent in payment of the salaries and expenses in each union for carrying on the revision, and providing the necessary lists and maps; that was to say, for carrying on almost the entire work. That being so, the question naturally arose, what was done with the remaining £13,000 Mr. Greene said it went in office expenditure, and he entered into an explanation of a course of proceeding which really had no existence. He said that the revising officers who were sent to each union did very little work—that they merely marked on the maps the lines of the new boundaries, and that the necessary details had to be obtained in the office in Dublin by reference to old books and maps—a course which involved considerable labour and expense. The House would hardly believe that the whole of this course of proceeding was purely imaginary. The revising officers did themselves actually perform all the work of the revision in the country, and there were no rules then in existence requiring them to transmit the information to the Dublin Office in order to have the results worked out there. But what did Mr. Greene do after giving his evidence before the Committee? He went over to Dublin and altered the rules previously existing, in order to make them correspond with his evidence. Next year he came before the Committee again, and without a word of explanation he handed in the altered rules, which required that the work should be done in Dublin, and they were now to be found in an appendix to the Report. This was most extraordinary conduct on the part of the head of any public Department. If that was to go on without censure, or such a man to be continued in his duties as valuator, his (The O'Conor Don's) troubling the House would have only been so much lost time. It was unnecessary to enter into further details of the extraordinary mismanagement of the present head of that public Department; but he might remark that an able officer who was sent over from the Treasury to Dublin to investigate the accounts found them in such a state that he could make nothing of them. In conclusion, he felt it right to call attention to that subject before the new Valuation Bill for Ireland came on, and he therefore begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

COLONEL FRENCH seconded the Motion, and expressed his opinion that further inquiries were necessary for the elucidation of this question. As far as he had gone, if the Report had been allowed to be made he was perfectly prepared that none of the head officers should have been allowed to remain in office. At the same time he thought the blame ought not so much to attach to Mr. Greene as to the successive Governments which had originated and perpetuated the whole of the system complained of.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the present constitution of the Irish Valuation Department is unsatisfactory, and that it is desirable that an experienced and competent officer be placed at its head."—(The O'Conor Don.)

MR. BAXTER said, he regretted very much that the hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Conor Don) had thought it his duty to rake up the ashes of this old controversy, and to bring before the House a squabble of a personal nature which he had thought was dead and buried in the archives of the Committee. As he admitted in the discussion two years ago, no doubt many things were done on false principles in former times, but all that had since been remedied. Mr. Vine, than whom no more competent and fearless officer could have been sent over by the Treasury to investigate the matter, found defects in the former system of keeping the books which could not be defended; but he stated that the Government would commit a great mistake if they parted with Mr. Greene, the present head of the Valuation Board. He had no interest except in getting the best man for the place. His hon. Friend had called upon him and asked him to look into the question of the management of the office. He had accordingly gone over the Report of the Committee, he had got the best information possible, and communicated with gentlemen far and wide, in whose judgment he placed the greatest reliance, and the result was that the opinion he had come to was very different from that of his hon. Friend. The present First Commissioner of Works, moreover, a Member of the Select Committee, while recognizing errors in management such as an experienced financier like Mr. Vine could point out, held that the Department had been honestly and efficiently conducted, and that the charges had not been proved. The President of the Local Government Board had come to the same conclusion, these opinions forming primâ facie ground for holding that Mr. Greene could not be so incompetent an officer as he had been represented. As to the alleged promise of the Government to make a reform, what he stated on a former occasion was that they had in preparation a Bill for the re-valuation of Ireland, and that it would be necessary to consider what changes in the Department were necessary. This promise had been performed this Session by the introduction of that Bill, which proposed the appointment of an Assistant Commissioner to assist Mr. Greene. Mr. Greene's evidence before the Committee had been described as confused and contradictory, but the questions put to him went back 40 years, and some of them would have puzzled Sir Richard Griffith, and it was easy to make a witness appear in an unfavourable light, especially if he was rather nervous and excited, and unusually anxious to do his duty. When two years ago the hon. Member renewed his Motion for a Committee, the Members of the original Committee deprecated the re-opening of the question, informing him that they had never been so bored in their lives; and that though Mr. Greene might have occasionally given confused answers, they deemed him a straightforward, honest man. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Sir F. Heygate) who had gone upon the Committee, expecting to ascertain the principle on which the valuation of Ireland was conducted, had stated that the whole time of the Committee was taken up in investigating personal complaints and charges, some of them of the most trivial kind. They were preferred by a few retired clerks, whose evidence was in the teeth of that given by their chief, and who, in 1865 and again in 1868, addressed Mr. Greene in terms of fulsome adulation, declaring his appointment the highest compliment that could have been paid to the Department. Mr. Greene was chosen as his assistant by Sir Richard Griffith, a distinguished man who held the Commissionership till 84 years of age, and was one of the most remarkable men living. He (Mr. Greene) began life as apprentice to an eminent firm of valuers, was employed by Mr. Brunel in valuing the Great Western Railway, and had been unanimously elected President of the Institution of Civil Engineers in Ireland. The testimony, moreover, before the Committee of the agents of Lord Lansdowne and Lord Pembroke was quite contrary to that of the retiring clerks. The hon. Member for Roscommon had sent circulars over Ireland respecting the state of the Board, and he had been favoured with an account of some of the meetings which had considered the matter. At Armagh the Board of Guardians refused to entertain the proposition contained in the circular, which was denounced by a resolution as an unwarrantable attack on the Commission dictated by political motives. At Tralee not a single Guardian took up the Petition; and at Downpatrick the same thing occurred. Inquiries conducted through official and private friends led to a like conclusion, and the testimony was unanimous on all hands that Mr. Greene was an excellent public servant. On these grounds he (Mr. Baxter) hoped the House would not adopt the Motion.

MR. HUNT said, he could corroborate the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that a greater waste of time had never fallen to the lot of any gentlemen belonging to the House than had been experienced on that Committee. The chief portion of the Committee's time was occupied in making investigations into the most trumped-up charges ever brought against a public servant. The witnesses had been either discarded or had ceased to be employed, and the Committee utterly disregarded their statements. The one thing which the Committee did find out was that in the very intricate calculations necessary to distribute the proportion between the Treasury and the different counties, some irregularities had been committed, which it was impossible for the Committee to unravel, and which were remitted to Mr. Vine to investigate. The Committee required that securities should be devised for preventing such irregularities in future. It was quite true that Mr. Greene had been confused in some of his answers before the Committee, which was a common enough thing with gentlemen of the most unquestioned integrity, who were subjected to a keen cross-examination before a Committee of this House, but the hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon, who was on the Committee, had not ventured at the end of the inquiry to submit any resolutions condemnatory of Mr. Greene or any other person or procedure.

THE O'CONOR DON said he had proposed a series of Resolutions which were carried by a majority of one in Committee.

MR. HUNT quoted the Report to show that the hon. Member had not at the conclusion of the inquiry moved Resolutions condemning Mr. Greene or any one else. In fact nothing occurred in the Committee in the least impugning the honour or capacity of Mr. Greene, and his impression was that he was the right man in the right place.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, that the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had forgotten a portion of the evidence which was very material. One of the principal parties in the office, Mr. Irwin, who had been sent to Bandon to revise the list of electors, read a letter to another party who had to come into the town also for the purpose of revision, and desired him to put himself in communication with the solicitor who represented the Conservative party. He did so, and the result was that several valuations of those who were Liberal electors were reduced by some 5s. or 10s., with the view of removing them from the roll, and an addition was made to some on the Conservative side for the purpose of giving them a vote. A representation was made to the office, and he was removed from the district with a reprimand and sent to the North of Ireland. He was subsequently promoted in the office, although he had been declared during the Dublin election inquiry to have been guilty of bribery. That was not an unimportant matter. Mr. Greene was as bad a witness as he had ever cross-examined, and his examination showed that he was ignorant of some of the principal duties of his office; besides there was strong evidence that he had been a promoter of an Orange lodge, which was an improper proceeding on the part of a public officer. It was too much to be told that there were no grounds for the imputation brought forward. In his opinion there were grounds, and there was very great dissatisfaction in Ireland upon the subject.

DR. BALL said he had listened carefully to his hon. Friend opposite (The O'Connor Don), but he had failed to discover that he had brought forward a single tangible charge against the office in question. Mr. Greene had only been at the head of the Valuation Office since 1868, and therefore it was unfair to call upon him to answer charges of the most remote antiquity—as far back as 40 years. In one instance the matter about which Mr. Greene was called upon for explanations occurred, as he stated, when he was only six years old. Knowing from the practice of the Courts what was the reputation of the Valuation Office in Ireland, he wished to give his unqualified testimony as to the general confidence reposed in it. It was quite true that the plans on which the Valuation of Ireland had been carried out were not uniform. In his circuit, for instance, it was perfectly well known that Griffith's valuation was 25 per cent under the letting value, while in the North of Ireland it was very near the value. But that created no inconvenience, because the principle on which the valuation had been conducted in each case was well understood. All the Office originally aimed at was that within a given union the plan of rating should be the same, so that one man should not be taxed more than another, but it was never laid down that it should be uniform all over the Island. The fact was that the valuations were made under different rules and at different times, and therefore it was that they required to be revised. He wished also to add that so distinguished a servant as the late Lord Mayo, when Secretary for Ireland, and thus having ample opportunity to judge, had expressed to him (Dr. Ball) the highest opinion of the value of Mr. Greene as a public official.

MR. AYRTON wished to make one or two observations, having sat upon the Committee as the representative of the Treasury, and also to correct an error into which the hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Connor Don) had fallen when he stated that he had made charges against Mr. Greene which had been sanctioned in Committee by a majority of one. The general impression made on his mind, after hearing all the evidence was that Mr. Greene in speaking of the proceedings of his office, naturally gave his views of what was present to his own mind as to the duties which the officers ought to perform. It was found, however, that there was a great variation in the mode in which the officers, who were employed in all parts of the country had conducted their duties, and that some of them had not acted in the manner in which Mr. Greene supposed was the regular order of proceeding. His hon. Friend (The O'Connor Don) had done injustice to himself in the course he had taken, because he had led the House to suppose that he entered into the question too much with a desire to impugn the character of Mr. Greene, and had forgotten the services which he himself rendered to Ireland in the conduct of this Committee. With regard to the main purpose for which this Committee was appointed, his hon. Friends rendered considerable service in calling attention to the manner in which the valuation ought to be conducted in certain parts of the country, which had led to important results, and, in fact, he had laid the foundation for the measure introduced this Session by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury. He (Mr. Ayrton) should therefore be very sorry to see the hon. Member's efforts diminished in their usefulness by his drawing attention to the very trifling matter which arose during the course of the inquiry. The proceedings in no way impugned the integrity of Mr. Greene, but rather the mode adopted by the Irish Administration for many years past. The explanation was simple. It had been the practice of the Government to ask Sir Richard Griffith to prepare for them a variety of statistical information respecting the character of the holdings in Ireland, as he was best able to give as head of the Valuation Office. Sir Richard Griffith performed those services from time to time, and further considered it his duty to allocate the cost of all those services as part of the business of his office. That was an error which was explained by Mr. Greene, and he then told the Committee he was satisfied those accounts could only be unravelled by an accountant. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) thereupon formalized Resolutions on the subject which the Committee unanimously adopted. His hon. Friend (The O'Connor Don) subsequently proposed certain Resolutions affecting the characters of Sir Richard Griffith and Mr. Greene; but he (Mr. Ayrton) pointed out to the Committee that there was no sufficient evidence to sustain them, and it was resolved they should not be taken into consideration until after hearing such further evidence as the Committee shall determine to receive. The hon. Gentleman would see that he was in error in saying the Resolution was adopted by the Committee, for on the contrary, they took further evidence, and he recollected very well the astonishment of the Committee when they heard the complete answer which was given on the points raised by his hon. Friend. So well satisfied were the Committee with the explanations, and so thoroughly did they understand that they did not impugn the position of Mr. Greene, that it was resolved the Resolution in question should not be printed with the Report lest it should go forth that there was some ground for making these serious charges. He was bound to say that Mr. Greene left the Committee with a character altogether unsullied and unimpeached. He was a man of great care and attention in the performance of his duties and was quite fit to be trusted with the supervision of his office. He was told that the office had been reconstituted and the expenditure diminished by something like £5,000 a-year. This showed an efficiency on the part of Mr. Greene which would entitle him rather to the praise than to the condemnation of the House. Sir Richard Griffith might be said to have built up the valuation from the quality of the soil and the great variety of attendant circumstances, and so to come to what he called an absolute standard of value. But there was no such standard. The only standard was what a man would give for the land as tenant. Therefore the errors were not in any way to be attributed to Mr.

Mr. Ayrton

Greene, who had only acted upon instructions carefully drawn up.

MR. HERON said, he had known Mr. Greene since 1868, and he was enabled to give an unbiassed opinion in favour of his competency, experience, and integrity in the management of the business of his office. He had no hesitation in saying that Mr. Greene was a most competent and efficient officer. He was surprised that anything like a Vote of Censure should have been moved, and if the hon. Member for Rosecommon went to a Division he would vote against him.

MR. VANCE also bore testimony to the high character and efficiency of Mr. Greene. He had only been six months in office when this Committee was appointed to inquire more into the transactions of the office than into Mr. Greene's own conduct. The charges against Mr. Greene himself had been sustained by the evidence of dismissed servants and by others who had previously subscribed to a testimonial, which he had, however, declined to accept. He hoped the House would not entertain this Vote of Censure, which would affect Sir Richard Griffith quite as much as Mr. Greene—both most deserving public officers, who had performed a work of the utmost importance in Ireland.

THE O'CONNOR DON, in reply, begged to say his charges against Mr. Greene had not been founded on his confused statements, but on his positive mis-statements before the Committee. By the time the Committee had finished the evidence it was so late in the Session that it was impossible to get Members to stay in town to consider the Report. The Committee therefore agreed with a proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) that after the inquiry to be instituted by the Treasury Commissioner the Committee should re-assemble in the following Session. The Treasury, however, after that inquiry, refused to re-appoint the Committee. He begged to disclaim all personal hostility against Mr. Greene, and had only taken up this question on public grounds. All he desired was that the re-valuation of Ireland which was about to be made should be in competent hands. It was useless to divide the House against the Government, and he would not therefore press his Motion to a Division.

TAXES ON LOCOMOTION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. LAING rose to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, Taxes on the means of Locomotion are opposed to public policy, and should be repealed at the earliest opportunity."

In bringing forward this subject he desired, in the first place, to defend himself from the charge of bringing forward an abstract resolution with the mere view of obtaining popular applause. In moving for the repeal of any tax the Mover was bound to show either that there was a surplus or else that there was an available substitute for the tax sought to be repealed. The object of his Motion was precise and definite; it was to repeal taxes, which in the aggregate amounted to about £1,500,000 sterling per annum. Taxes on locomotion consisted—first, of that on railway passengers, which amounted in the year 1872 to £527,560; secondly, the licence duty on horses, £451,143; and thirdly, the duty on carriages, £524,593, making a total of £1,503,704. The question which had at the outset to be considered was whether the reduction of £1,500,000 in the taxation of the country was within the reach of the present state of the finances without the necessity of imposing some substitute. Upon that point there could be no doubt whatever. The Revenue accounts for the past financial year showed a surplus of £5,000,000. Assuming that the same taxes were to be collected during the ensuing year as had been collected in the past year, there would be a surplus of £5,000,000 for the ensuing year, that would show a surplus of ordinary revenue over ordinary expenditure for the two financial years of £10,000,000. Deducting from this the indemnity charge for the Alabama claims with interest, set down at £3,250,000, there would remain a surplus of £6,500,000. But against that must be reckoned £2,500,000, included in the ordinary expenditure of the year in the form of terminable annuities, which was really a surplus income applied in the reduction of the National Debt, and which, in two years, would amount to £5,000,000, so that a surplus would appear of not less than £11,000,000 or £12,000,000, after deducting the payment of the Alabama indemnity. It would be entirely contrary to the precedents set by our greatest financiers of modern times to apply the whole of this large sum towards the payment of the National Debt. The policy of Sir Robert Peel and of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had always been to lighten as far as possible the restrictions upon the springs of trade, and to confine the payments on account of our National Debt to moderate dimensions. At the expiration of the late terminable annuities the House made provision for the special application of £2,500,000 a-year to the reduction of the National Debt. That was a compromise between the extreme opinions of those who maintained that extraordinary efforts should be made for the reduction of the National Debt, and of those who held that to raise money by taxation for the purpose of investing it at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, which was what they did when they reduced debt, was bad policy. He thought, therefore, that ample provision had been made towards the reduction of the Debt. Deducting the sum required to meet the Alabama Indemnity, the surplus remaining of the two years at least would be £6,500,000, while the surplus of the current year would certainly not be less than £3,000,000. The amount of taxation, therefore, the repeal of which he sought was perfectly within the reach of the ascertained surplus of the coming financial year. The appeal which he made stood in a totally different class from appeals made for the total abolition of the income tax and the malt tax. Those branches of taxation could not be repealed without an alteration of our financial policy, and the finding of fresh forms of taxation. On the other hand, this tax could be at once removed without any necessity arising for any substituted tax. He could approach the question, therefore, on its merits, unimpeded by the objections which applied to a mere abstract Resolution. As regarded locomotion generally, he asked was there anything in the history of modern civilization which had been or was of more material importance. The application of steam for the purposes of locomotion had furnished one of the greatest civilizing elements of modern times. So long as the means of locomotion were expensive it was the monopoly of the higher class; the lower class were left in the condition of serfs, being tied down to the soil on which they lived. But the modern facilities of locomotion had changed this condition, and been a potent instrument for the extension of industry and wealth. To what an extent these facilities had been availed of was shown by the single fact that the passengers conveyed by railway in one year amounted to the enormous total of 360,000,000, and when he said that the average receipt from each passenger was only 1s. 6d. he thought he sufficiently proved that the means of locomotion was no longer an attribute of the wealthy. Could this taxation on locomotion be reconciled with those great principles of financial policy, which for the last 30 years had so largely prevailed in this country? In 1842, the great financial reformer, Sir Robert Peel, laid down the principle of lightening taxation upon all branches of industry—that nothing should be taxed, so to say, at its source; that there should be no tax on raw materials, on tools, or trade—no tax, in short, on that which went towards the production of wealth and the encouragement of industry. The response which followed the carrying out of that policy was immediate and remarkable. As fast as taxes were taken off the revenue was found to increase. Since 1856, £27,000,000 of taxation had been removed, and yet the revenue was now £10,000,000 greater than when the reduction of taxation began. He asked whether in the modern state of industry in this country the means of locomotion did not rank with taxes on raw materials, and whether the means of personal locomotion were not necessary and essential to the transacting of business, and therefore to the accumulating of wealth. Of the 360,000,000 passengers carried in a year, the enormous majority moved for the purpose, not of pleasure, but of business. The horse and gig took the farmer to fair and market, and were as essential a part of his stock in trade as his plough was. A vast amount of the business of the country depended on the facilities of locomotion, by which the merchant was brought in contact with the manufacturer, and the agricultural labourer from the South was enabled to seek employment in the North, or wherever else there was a demand for labour. In fact, locomotion was one of the primary and essential elements in the production of modern wealth. If he required authority in support of his

Motion, he could quote a high one—that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, in his Budget speech of 1869, in taking off taxes on locomotion, said—"They have been given up by default long ago. It has always been admitted that whenever they could be reduced or remitted they ought to be." That time, he submitted, had now arrived. £1,500,000 would clear the statute book of every vestige of the tax, while a principle would be carried out which had not been merely vaguely enunciated, but had been acted upon; for the mileage duty on stage coaches and omnibuses had been reduced four times and repealed altogether in 1869. The tax he now sought to have removed was not only flagrantly unjust, but was also anomalous. Why should passengers proceeding by steamboat or omnibus from Westminster to London Bridge be carried free of duty, while if they proceeded by railway they would be subject to duty? He would proceed to deal with taxes which formed the last remnant of the burdens on locomotion. In 1832, when the tax on railway passenger traffic was imposed, there was a heavy duty on stage carriages and post-horses, and a halfpenny duty per mile was imposed for every two passengers conveyed by post-horses. Naturally, therefore, a corresponding duty was imposed upon passengers conveyed upon railways. At that time railway fares averaged more than 3d. per mile, and from London to Birmingham there was no third-class. The tax then averaged something under 4 per cent upon the gross fares. In 1842 the stage carriage duty was reduced by one-half; and the railway duty was commuted to 5 per cent upon the gross receipts from passengers—a rate at which it now remained. In 1844 the Cheap Train Act was passed, with the wise policy of inducing Railway Companies to provide cheap locomotion for the poorer classes. By that Act Railway Companies were compelled to run one cheap train a-day at 1d. per mile. The passengers by the trains were exempted from duty; and, in order to encourage the Railway Companies to extend their third class accommodation, Parliament gave a discretionary power to the Board of Trade to sanction trains upon conditions as favourable, or more favourable than the Parliamentary trains, and to exempt the passengers by these trains from duty. Though no alteration had been made in the railway passenger duty since that period, the mileage duty on stage carriages and omnibuses—which were the equivalents or rather the foundation of the railway duties—had since been reduced three times, and in 1869 was repealed altogether. But what was remarkable was that within the last few years a claim had been set up by the Board of Inland Revenue to compel the payment of a duty for third-class passengers, with the exception of the compulsory Parliamentary train; though for 16 years it had been assumed that these trains were exempt from duty. Nothing could be more anomalous and absurd than that if you complied literally with the Act of 1842, stopping the train at every station and taking 24 hours in going from London to Scotland, you should be exempt from taxation, while if you afforded a third-class passenger superior accommodation, taking him to Scotland in 12 hours instead of 24, you should pay a tax amounting to 10 per cent upon the net receipts from that passenger. Railway Companies were no lovers of strikes; but if they refused some day to convey third-class passengers from London to Scotland, except in 24 hours, on account of this Government duty, no Government could withstand such a pressure as would be put upon them. It was well for the Government that they had to deal with a body who were averse from strikes, and were not likely, therefore, to resort to such an extremity. He appealed, however, to the fairness of the Government whether, because Railway Companies bore a good deal of squeezing, that therefore they should be mulcted and compelled to submit to so monstrous an injustice. Take the case of the metropolitan traffic as an instance of the unequal working of the existing system. If passengers went by tramway the amount of taxation on every £100 of gross revenue amounted on the average to 1s. 1½d. If they went by omnibus the percentage of taxation on gross revenue was 17s. 7d. If they went by steamer there was no duty. But by railway under the former construction of the law the percentage of taxation on gross revenue would be £2 13s.; and under the construction contended for by the Commissioners the tax would be £5. Was it right that railway proprietors should be treated almost as outlaws—at all events, should be put in a worse position than other people—for having constructed the railway system of the United Kingdom at their own risk, and frequently at their own loss? Five per cent on the gross passenger traffic was equivalent to 10 per cent on the net traffic; and, supposing one half the revenue of railways to accrue from passengers and one half from goods, the duty would amount to 5 per cent on the total net income of a railway. But the whole of this tax fell upon ordinary shareholders, whereas half the railway capital consisted of debenture and loan capital, so that again raised the duty to one of 10 per cent upon the income derived from their investments by ordinary shareholders. Nor was this all, because railway proprietors paid not only this excessive amount of Imperial taxation, but an excessive amount of local taxation. They paid 2s. in the pound for Imperial taxation and 3s. in the pound for local taxation, though railways imposed no burden on the poor rates, but gave employment and so relieved the rates. This, however, was another question affecting railways. The duty pressed with peculiar hardship upon a great many Railway Companies which were in a comparatively poor condition. The Metropolitan Railway Company, and many other Railway Companies in the neighbourhood of London, which were carrying large masses of the people at low rates, were, owing to exceptional circumstances, in comparatively poor circumstances, and were paying to their shareholders miserable dividends, or no dividends at all. It was entirely untrue, and a most narrow view of the case, to suppose that Railway shareholders were alone interested in this question. He contended that the public had an immediate interest in this question, as well as Railway proprietors. He believed that all Railway Companies had the power of adding the Government duty to the passenger fare. In some cases they did so. A repeal of the duty would therefore be of immediate advantage to the public. The shareholders in a great number of Railway Companies were carrying on an agitation for an increase of fares in consequence of the enormous increase of the working expenses to which they were subjected. All experience showed that the public would get the full benefit of any prosperity which might befall the Railways; indeed, he thought that the public had already had the lion's share of the advantage which had resulted. When this duty was first imposed the average charge per mile to passengers throughout the kingdom was about 3*d.*; it was now little more than 1*d.* At that time third-class passengers were almost unknown, and when the directors were compelled to run a single train at 1*d.* per mile daily this was looked upon almost as an innovation which would ruin the railways; but now the trains which did not carry third-class passengers were an exception to the rule, and in a great many cases third-class passengers were carried at a rate very much lower than 1*d.* per mile. Only the other day, Mr. Knight, the General Manager of the Brighton Railway, with which he (Mr. Laing) was connected, said that if the Passenger Duty were abolished he would recommend the Board of that Company to have only two classes of carriages—that was to say, to make the third-class into second-class, and the second-class into first, with regard to accommodation; but to make a downward move as regarded the fares—that is, to reduce the fares of the first-class to the level of the second class, and the fares of the second-class to the level of the third. If changes of this character were doubtful, nothing could be easier than to make them conditions of the removal of the duty, so as to secure these and similar advantages to the public. He did not make the Motion in the interest principally of Railways, but for the general public. His experience had satisfied him that the interests of the two were identical, and if the Railway Companies obtained this boon and did not fully share it with the public they would be defeating their own objects; but he believed that if this duty were abolished, not more than six months would elapse before reductions of that sort would be made by the majority of the Railway Companies. The next important branch of the subject related to the tax on horses. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted that the horse was the very life and soul of locomotion. It was essential to the carrying on of the work of a farmer. The tax upon horses was unjustifiable, like the tax upon passenger traffic. It prevented the rearing of horses as much as the malt tax limited the growth of barley. While we were groaning over the deficient supply of horses, and wondering whether in the event of a war we should be able to obtain a sufficient number of horses for our cavalry or our artillery, we were laying a tax upon horses which amounted to 10 per cent upon their value. The other, and last branch of taxation on locomotion, was that of wheeled carriages. Four-wheeled carriages were subject to a duty two guineas, and two-wheeled carriages and a certain class of small four-wheeled carriages were subject to a tax of 15*s.* The total produce from this source amounted to £524,993. A large number of these vehicles constituted what might be termed the daily necessities of a large class of the community. Farmers, tradesmen, clerks, and others in business could not pursue their vocations without the use of gigs, carts, cabs, and omnibuses; and women of the middle, the lower middle, and the working classes, were almost entirely dependent on frys and omnibuses in getting from one part of a large town to another. Thus it would be seen that thousands of our population were obliged to avail themselves of the cheap mode of travelling afforded by these vehicles. One great anomaly of this tax was that it did not extend to Ireland. The principle of our present system of finance was to assimilate, as far as possible, the taxation of the two countries, and he warned all Irish Members that unless they assisted him to repeal this tax for England it would before very long be extended to Ireland. It was a striking instance of the evil of this impost, that while it was almost impossible to obtain a conveyance at many of our provincial railway stations, at every small railway station in Ireland there were always plenty of cars and other vehicles to be had. There were, however, other anomalies connected with this tax. For instance, in the County which he had the honour to represent about half the farmers lived in islands, and in attending markets they used their boats, on which no tax was levied; whereas the other half of them, who lived on the mainland, had to use horses and carts or gigs, for which they were heavily taxed. The inconvenience of the tax had been admitted when the 32 & 33 Vict. was passed, which permitted the farmer to use his horse for the purpose of attending Divine service; but if horses were exempt from tax when used in conveying a man's family to a place of Divine worship, why should they not be exempt also in many other instances, such as fetching the doctor for a sick wife, or some other member of the family? It was one of the signs of a bad tax that it always bristled with exceptions and anomalies, and occasioned a great deal of vexation and annoyance in comparison with the small amount of money it brought in. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in their last Report, said that the licence duties, like all direct taxes, were more troublesome, both to those who collected and those who paid them, than were indirect taxes. It was quite certain that the frequent surcharges in respect of this tax rendered it exceedingly burdensome to farmers, who were continually called upon to pay fines for having unknowingly transgressed the law in the use of their horses and carts. The only objection to this part of his Motion appeared to him to be the fact that a number of persons kept horses and carriages for pleasure and amusement, but the number was so small compared with the total, and it was not worth while, for the sake of the small sum that the rich were compelled to pay in respect to their vehicles and horses, to preserve such an obnoxious tax, especially as in 1869 the Chancellor of the Exchequer abolished the distinction between horses kept for pleasure and horses kept for trade. This was now a great opportunity for the Government, which he hoped they would embrace, to perfect the great reform in our financial system which had been commenced by Sir Robert Peel in 1842, and which had been continued by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and there appeared to be but one step more required to crown the edifice by relieving locomotion from all taxation and making it as free as the bread we eat and the air we breathe. The number of horse licences was 840,847, and that of carriage licences 422,597, while the number of railway shareholders, according to an approximate estimate, based on the number of shareholders in proportion to capital on several lines, was about 300,000. 1,500,000 persons would therefore be directly benefited by this moderate remission of taxation. He did not mention this as showing, with elections in prospective, the fair popularity which would attend the measure, for in framing our financial system higher considerations than immediate popularity should be looked to. To a certain class of minds unpopularity might seem to recommend a thing, but our financiers should guard against this error, for while there was an unsound popularity to be gained by remissions made with a view to court applause, there was a sound popularity which sprang from a remission affecting a large and important section of the community. He mentioned the 1,500,000 persons, therefore, as showing how wide the area of relief would be, rather than its popularity. The principle of freeing locomotion from taxes was laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech of 1869, and to him, therefore, would belong the greater part of the credit if it were now accomplished. He presented himself in no spirit of antagonism to the Government, but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give him an assurance which would obviate the necessity of pressing the Motion, but, failing this, he was so confident in the soundness of the principle and in its immediate practicability, that he should do his best to carry it, feeling that he should be doing the Chancellor of the Exchequer a service in coupling, with or without his consent, the name of Lowe with free locomotion. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. GREGORY said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) proposed by this Resolution to spirit away a considerable amount of the money which was supposed to be at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and for one object only. It was generally the case that an expected surplus evoked plenty of claimants. He did not consider this an agricultural question or that the hon. Member had a right to ask for the support of the farmers on this question as one affecting their interests. The tax on horses only remotely concerned them, animals employed in agriculture being exempt, while there was no great injustice in a moderate tax on horses kept for luxury or locomotion. It was true that some years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the principle of reducing the taxes on horses employed in locomotion and anticipated the benefits which would arise from horses being employed in the conveyance of persons to and from stations, and in drawing conveyances used by the public. But he did not think that the public had obtained cheaper or better conveyances, or that any great improvement had taken place in them so as to lead to a desire for an extension of the policy which the right hon. Gentleman had recommended. The Motion was in reality an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of railway locomotion only. It was a Motion in the interest of railway companies and railway proprietors. The hon. Gentleman anticipated great benefits from its adoption, but what guarantee did he offer that there should be benefits to the public. He trusted the House would not be led away by any conversation which might have passed between the Chairman of the Brighton Company and its traffic manager, who held out certain improvements as likely to result from this remission. Traffic managers were given to large and vague statements, and had sometimes induced Parliamentary Committees to sanction schemes by the results which they had held out; but he hoped that the House would not be influenced by them. The Motion itself embodied nothing of the kind. It pledged the House to a simple repeal of the taxes on locomotion. Now, who was to have the benefit of the proposed remission? Why, in the first instance, the Railway Companies would derive the benefit. And how, he should like to know, was it to be brought out of their pockets for the benefit of the public? He admitted that railways had given great facilities to trade and commerce. But there was another side of the question. Railway proprietors complained that they did not receive that amount of remuneration to which they were entitled. But they forgot that a great deal of the money that had been laid out had been wastefully expended, that they had made lines which they ought not to have made, and entered into contests and waged war with other companies when they ought not to have done so. The late Mr. Robert Stephenson, indeed, told him during a severe contest between the Brighton and South-

Eastern Companies, that £500,000 had been already expended in it, and that he could have stopped all this but for the temper of three men on each side. He feared that temper accounted for much foolish expenditure, and inadequate dividends therefore formed no ground for abolishing this tax.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR seconded the Motion on the broad ground that any measure which cheapened locomotion would confer a great advantage on the country. In support of the present proposal, he quoted the Report of a Select Committee of that House, which inquired about a third of a century ago into the subject of taxation on internal communication. That Committee pointed out the great evils of the taxation then existing on carriages and horses, showed that Ireland benefited largely by its exemption from such taxation, and suggested that England should enjoy the same advantage. The Committee therefore recommended the abolition of the taxes on horses, public conveyances, and carriages generally, observing that the immediate loss of revenue incident to such a change, would be in great measure compensated by an increased consumption of taxable commodities, while an inequality would be removed, and the comfort and prosperity of a commercial people promoted. That reasoning was equally applicable to the Motion now before the House. England, Scotland, and Wales were subject to a species of taxation from which Ireland was entirely exempt; and he maintained that all parts of the United Kingdom ought to be placed on an equality in that respect. The hon. Member observed that these taxes had been objected to by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury in his Budget Speech of 1866, and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue had, in 1872, in their 15th Report, pointed out, as explained in the excellent speech of the hon. Member for Orkney, that the whole of the taxes now known as the "Establishment Licences" were troublesome, "both to those who collect them and those who pay them." They further added that—

"The enormous correspondence is quite disproportionate to the amount of duty collected, and the number of prosecutions found necessary for the maintenance of a revenue of little more than one million and a quarter is 40 or 50 times greater than the number instituted in the same year in the collection of nine millions and a half—the duty charged in England and Scotland on spirits."

In the same Report the Commissioners pointed out the vexatious consequences of these taxes allowing of exemptions in various ways, for not taking out licences. This recent view of the Inland Board of Revenue was in accord with their 10th Report, issued in 1866, wherein the Commissioners explained that Mr. Gladstone had

"dwelt at some length upon the taxes on locomotion, and expressed his regret that the surplus at his disposal did not enable him to propose a larger measure of relief from these imposts in their existing form."

No doubt since then changes had been made in these taxes, but they still existed, and in a way which undoubtedly prevented that free movement which so greatly benefited a country; and now that there was such a vast surplus revenue, this was the time to free the country from a kind of taxation which, however suitable for local purposes, was quite unsuitable for Imperial Revenue. And, as before said, the time was opportune to place Great Britain on the same system of taxation as Ireland was, in being exempt from all these taxes. The fact of there being a dog tax in Ireland, and which was collected, not for the Imperial Revenue but for local purposes, was a strong example in favour of the dog tax levied in Great Britain, and included amongst those known as the "Establishment Licences," being given up as an Imperial tax as well as the other licences. This change would also have a most useful effect in settling the question so troublesome to both parties, as to how to adjust the claim of aids from the Exchequer for local expenditure.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was proverbially easy to make out a case against any tax; and it did not require the great knowledge and financial ability of the hon. Member for Orkney to make a most plausible, and, indeed, a most true case against the taxes which remained upon locomotion. Nothing in the world was so easy as to make out a case against a particular tax, but that was not the way in which the House should look at this question. In all these matters of taxation, they had only a choice of evils; and the only question was whether they would do wisely in following the advice of his hon. Friend the Member for Orkney, by abstracting their minds from any alternative proposal, and fixing them simply on the particular grievance which he had placed before them. One thing his hon. Friend had left out of sight in connection with that tax. There was a peculiarity about railways—which he agreed with the hon. Member for Sussex (Mr. Gregory) was the main question in his hon. Friend's mind—there was a peculiarity about railways which distinguished them from almost all other subjects of taxation, and that was that they possessed a qualified monopoly. The maximum limit of railway charges was so very high—so much higher than those charges actually amounted to—that it really gave the companies a large and undefined power of taxing Her Majesty's subjects. When persons were acting under the pressure of competition, they were kept within very narrow bounds as to what they did. But where that pressure was removed, and the Railway Companies were left to their own discretion, those who complained of these taxes had themselves the power of imposing them; and that not with reference to the terms on which they could afford to do the work, but with reference to the much larger powers they possessed of obtaining the sole property and dominion over portions of the country. That afforded a justification for taxing railways which did not exist in any other case, and the two things ought not to be mixed up together. Even supposing all other taxes on locomotion were removed, there would still be this broad and manifest distinction between them and the taxes on railways,—that all other carriers acted under the most unlimited competition, whereas railways had obtained, by the nature of the case and by the privileges which Parliament had given them, certain local monopolies which enabled them to exact not necessarily equal rates from persons who were similarly situated, but larger rates from some and smaller from others. There seemed to be no fairer subject of taxation, then, than that which had about it the appearance of a monopoly. His hon. Friend had spoken of their relieving 1,500,000 persons by taking off that tax, but that after all was a very small number indeed. It would be very easy, however, to mention a tax the remission of which would relieve, not 1,500,000, but 30,000,000 people. If numbers were to a criterion, though he did not say they were, his hon. Friend had put forward the weak rather than the strong side of that tax. Now, he wished to see all trades and occupations as free as possible from taxation. That was a sound and right principle; but, as he had said, all these things were a choice of evils and of convenience, and it was not a question whether that particular tax was good in itself, but whether it was the one which most strongly called for remission. That was a point which he thought could hardly be decided by a discussion in which attention was necessarily confined to that tax alone, and all others were kept out of view. But there was another point that he wished to submit to the House, and it was this:—On Monday it would be his duty to state to the House the financial proposals of the Government for the coming year. It was certainly the practice and custom of the House—and wisely so, he thought—to leave these matters of difficulty and delicacy to those who were in the habit of looking at them from the position of responsibility and authority which the Members of the Government occupied by having for the time the support of the majority of that House, rather than that they should be taken up by any private Member. They were more likely to have the public interests fairly considered and legislated for by those who were personally responsible for any proposals which might be made than if proposals were brought forward by any private member, however eminent or however qualified to deal with such subjects. Now, if that diminution of taxation which his hon. Friend had urged was a point of his financial scheme on next Monday, it was quite obvious that any interposition of that House would be superfluous and useless. If it was not, it was equally obvious that the House was now asked to pass a judgment on what ought to be the financial policy of the Government without having before it, as it ought to have, the alternatives which they would have to lay before it. The House, therefore, would not now be judging on the case after hearing all the circumstances, and all that could be said on both sides, but would be adopting a particular view, shutting its eyes to all other things, and insisting on taking away responsibility from those on whom the House and the Constitution of the country imposed it. He said that, whatever opinion hon. Members might have about that tax, they would not be acting in a prudent manner if they followed such a course. They would do more wisely to restrain their impatience for six days longer until they heard the proposals of the Government. If those proposals met with their approbation, they could support them. If not, it would be competent for his hon. Friend the Member for Orkney to run his horse against the Government horse. And if his hon. Friend's proposal should be one more worthy of consideration than those of the Government, it would be competent for the House to adopt it. That would be quite fair and open; but he thought it would be full of evil precedent if at a period so very close to the announcement of the financial policy of the year, when it must be understood by all that whatever they were going to do was really determined upon, and arrangements made accordingly, the House would not allow them to propound their policy, but insisted on forcing on them a Resolution like the present, without hearing what they had to say. He might point out that the pecuniary amount at stake was by no means small; it was no less than £1,500,000. That was a considerable sum to dispose of, and the House ought to consider well before they made up their minds to remit a tax which so largely affected the revenue. Although his hon. Friends knew very well that he was by no means unfavourable to the views with regard to locomotion which they had propounded, he still could not give his assent to the proposal which had been submitted to the House. He felt he should be unworthy of the office he had the honour to hold if he were not prepared to vindicate for himself the right, not, of course, to dictate to the House, but to lay before it the best proposals he could make in connection with his financial statement. He therefore hoped that his hon. Friend would be content with the impulse he had given to the question, and that the matter would not be pressed to a division, for the only effect of doing so would be greatly to embarrass the financial policy of the Government, and to set a precedent which he did not think it was desirable to establish.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he had always felt it his duty in that House to oppose abstract Resolutions on Questions of finance, and was of opinion that the present Resolution was calculated to place hon. Members in an unfair position. It tended to produce the taking of things separately which ought to be taken conjointly, and reminded him of the saying that every wine was good, but that some wines were better than others, for it raised the question of every tax being bad, while some taxes were worse than others. He generally felt alarm on hearing an hon. Member urge in support of his particular proposal that it would lighten the springs of industry. It reminded him of a remark made by a gentleman some time ago in reference to a person who had become generally embarrassed in circumstances — "What could you expect of a fellow who had frittered away his fortune in paying his tradesmans' bills." When, he might add, he saw countries like France and America making such efforts to pay off their debts, he did not think it creditable to us to postpone our obligations, and he had no doubt we should be recompensed in the future for any sacrifice which we might make in that direction at the present time.

MR. MELLY, although he desired to support the Motion so far as it related to the passenger duty, did not think it would be desirable at the present moment to force the hand of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He might mention that the gross receipts of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway for the year ending in December last were for passengers, £524,572; season tickets, £51,842, making a total of £576,414; from which, if the working expenses, £259,386, were deducted, it would be found that the profit of £317,028 remained. It would also be seen that the passenger duty paid for the half-year was £18,817, which was equal to an income tax on the profit of 1s. 2½d. in the pound. He might add that from the published accounts of the Metropolitan District Railway for the past half-year it appeared that their receipts for passengers were £93,629, and their working expenses £46,814, which left a profit of £46,815; their payment for passenger duty was £2,667, which was equal to an additional income tax of 1s. 1½d. in the pound. Now, as the shareholders in all the Railway Companies already paid the ordinary income tax upon their dividends, he could see no good reason why they should be called upon to pay taxes a second time upon the same income. He felt sure, therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take into his consideration the desirability of taking away, at all events, the passenger duty.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE could not help complaining of the action of the Board of Inland Revenue in taking a course which tended to restrict the means of locomotion at the command of third-class passengers. He thought that every facility should be afforded for the transport of the labouring classes, whether travelling for pleasure or in pursuit of their daily labour. He could not, however, vote for the Motion because it was opposed to the policy of imposing any tax whatsoever on locomotion.

COLONEL BERESFORD wished to point out that there was a tax levied on omnibuses at the same rate as on the carriages of the aristocracy, which amounted to 1½ per cent in the case of the London General Omnibus Company. He might say nothing that had fallen from the hon. Member for the Orkneys had convinced him that the tax, of which complaint was made, was not, after all, paid by the passengers.

MR. PEASE said, that the present passenger duty presented a great anomaly which would have, sooner or later, to be redressed. A third-class train which travelled from London to York in seven or eight hours, crawling along and stopping at all the stations, was exempted from duty, but if a third-class train did the same journey rapidly, running through several stations, the Company had to pay the duty. He trusted that on Monday night it would be found that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given not only consideration but favourable consideration to this question. The present system was a bar to studying the convenience of the public.

MR. LAING said, that he should not feel justified, after the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in pressing the Motion to a division; but if the matter should not be dealt with in the Budget, he would bring it forward again, and run his horse against that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He begged leave therefore to withdraw his Motion.

Question put, and negatived.

SUEZ CANAL—AUGMENTATION OF DUES.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the interests of British shipowners in the navigation of the Suez Canal, and to move—

"That, the Commerce of this Country being so deeply interested in the uninterrupted navigation of the Suez Canal, it is desirable that Her Majesty's Government should at once give its adhesion to the judicial reforms in Egypt, suggested and approved of by the Representatives of all the European Powers, by which tribunals will be created for the better administration of justice in Egypt, and the adjudication of differences which may arise between British Shipowners and the administrators of the Suez Canal Company."

said, he wished to point out where he thought the Government had been very much to blame in their recent policy with respect to Egypt. There was nothing more remarkable than the progress which had been made during recent years in our communication with the East. Through the exertions of Lieutenant Waghorn the overland route had been established, and afterwards a railway was constructed. When this railway was established in 1852, the French Government saw the mistake which they had made in opposing it, and M. de Lesseps commenced that wonderful work which had been so successfully carried out, the Suez Canal. M. de Lesseps had remarked to him—"My first principle in life was always to have confidence," and he had succeeded where the Ptolemies had failed. The undertaking was started by a French Company; but in the Firman it was called a Turco-Egyptian association, and was subject to the laws and customs of the Turco-Egyptian Government. The Suez Canal cost £16,000,000, half of which was subscribed by a French Company; and, notwithstanding the Canal was on the high road to India, the scheme had never been supported by the English Government; Lord Palmerston, indeed, did everything to oppose it, and not a hundred pounds of English money was engaged in the speculation. The French Company now possessed £12,000,000 out of the £16,000,000 expended on the scheme, and none could fail to give M. de Lesseps every credit for the energy with which he had carried out the work. In consequence of M. de Lesseps having been left to overcome his difficulties as best he could, the affairs of the Company were subject to Egyptian law, and the rates and dues were to be levied subject to the Egyptian Government. The tonnage rate for goods was 10½d. per ton, and 10d. for each passenger, so that one of our troop ships on her way to India paid something like £1,400. Two years ago M. de Lesseps made a change in the method of levying these dues; he did not alter the rate, but he resolved that in future the charge should be made upon the gross instead of upon the net tonnage, the result being that the ships paid on the engines and boilers and all spare space. That had been done in the beginning of 1872, and since then ships had been charged, not on the net tonnage, but on the gross tonnage. Well, what occurred the other day? The Messageries Maritimes appealed against that proceeding to the Chamber of Commerce in France, and in two or three months a decision was given in favour of the Suez Canal Company. The case was then carried to another Court in Paris, which reversed the decision. But, in point of fact, the whole case between the Messageries Maritimes and the Suez Canal Company was a private arrangement, the object being to put the authority over the Suez Canal Company into the hands of a French Court. That naturally excited great indignation. Now, he wanted to know whether, when the matter was laid before the Government, they resisted or accepted what had been done? There was another point which was deserving of attention. By the capitulations with Egypt anything brought before a Court must be tried in the defendant's Court, and therefore, whenever our shipowners appealed against these excessive tolls, the action was brought before the Court of the French Consul General at Cairo. He need not say that the decisions were naturally given against us. This point brought him to the question of judicial reforms, and he regretted to have to say that in his opinion the Foreign Secretary had entirely failed in his duty of representing our interests in the East. On the 22nd of July, 1870, when the question of judicial reforms was brought before the Turkish and Egyptian Courts, Lord Granville wrote—

"The two Governments of England and France agreeing to the proposed reforms, it seems to Her Majesty's Government that the basis of this accord should be made known to the other Governments who were represented on the Committee that sat at Cairo. It remains with the Viceroy to obtain the consent of the Sultan to these proposed reforms."

He (Mr. Cochrane) had the honour of bringing the question before the House last year, and subsequently in the autumn the Commissioners met at Constantinople, and the judicial reforms were agreed to. But suddenly the French Government, seeing the importance of keeping the Suez Canal in the hands of France, and of thus having it in its power to stop our communications with the East, said they would not consent to those judicial reforms. Every Government in Europe, with the exception of France, was in favour of them. But what did Lord Granville do? Did he show that courage which an English Foreign Minister ought to display, or that decision of character which we had a right to expect from him, when France, for her own selfish purpose, refused her consent to the judicial reforms? Not at all. Lord Granville only said—"We will never do anything without the consent of France." Who was President of the Commission at Constantinople? Our most admirable Consul General, Sir Philip Francis. But though all were agreed as to the absolute necessity of those judicial reforms, and there was not a dissentient voice, except that of France, Lord Granville suddenly said that he would not act without France, and the whole thing fell to the ground. Lord Granville, in 1870, held the opinion which Lord Clarendon and Lord Derby held before him. Her Majesty's Government could not doubt that the system which now prevailed in Egypt, with regard to trying suits in which foreigners on the one hand, and the people of Egypt on the other were concerned, was injurious to all parties, as it was certainly without the warrant of any Treaty engagements. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, were willing to lend their aid to establish a better system; but if the other Powers agreed in the same object, why should we hold back because France suddenly refused her consent? It was not right that we should be parties to a system which might have been very well of old, but was not suitable to the present time, and was most injurious to British interests. What was the fact? Why, that out of 100 ships passing through the Canal, 79 carried the British flag. That Canal the French had got so much into their hands that there was not a single employé connected with it that was not a Frenchman. They could close the Canal whenever they liked, and need not let a vessel enter until it had paid any dues they wished to charge with 60 per cent extra tax; and then they said—"You may bring your action against us; but when you do you must carry it into a French Consular Court." The consequence of closing the Canal for one month would be most serious to us. On Friday the House would be asked to consider the Euphrates Valley as a communication with the East; but surely we ought to insist upon our existing means of communication being regulated in such a manner as to win the approval of Europe. He wanted to ask the noble Lord (Viscount Enfield) as he (Mr. Cochrane) had tried in vain to obtain Papers, what the Government had done, or what representations they had made after the decisions which had been given in the French Courts. Had they protested against the authority of those Courts? The question of tonnage dues was comparatively unimportant. What was important was whether the Suez Canal being of such vital consequence to us, there was a power of closing it against us, or of putting such tolls on our ships passing through as virtually to close it against us whenever the French chose. He had heard it said that if those tolls were collected for the future, it would be impossible even for the Peninsular and Oriental Company to send their ships through. Millions of money had been spent since the opening of the Canal in building ships fitted for the navigation of the Canal. Was that a matter which was of no concern to us? Anyone who had been in Egypt must have seen how important were our relations with that country. One third of the people employed there were English, and at the present moment there were parties of English surveying the ground for railways up to the Upper Nile. By the policy now adopted by the Foreign Office our prestige in the East was being weakened, and our relations with India and our colonies endangered. This was a question of so much importance, that late as the hour was he had ventured briefly to call attention to it, and unless he obtained a most satisfactory explanation from the noble Lord, he would certainly divide the House on the Resolution. He begged now to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. EASTWICK: Sir, I imagine that every one will admit that it was high time that this most important subject should be brought before the House, and for my part I regret that the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight, who has given so much attention to it, has not dealt with it even more fully. The manner in which it affects the commercial interests of this country is of course obvious, but it reaches beyond them, and is still more important in a political point of view. Nor do I believe that the necessity for discussing it has been in the very least degree diminished by the assurance which the Noble Lord, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, gave us the other night, that his Department is busy with the question. We are all aware that the Foreign Office has been busy with this question of the Suez Canal for some 18 years, but it will surprise me very much if any hon. Member should rise in his place and say he finds comfort in that fact. To borrow a phrase used by the noble Lord in the Debate of the 5th July last year, "the Foreign Office has not spoiled the Egyptians," but it certainly long did its very best to spoil their Canal. I should like to ask whether any one can now look back without pain and mortification to that invidious opposition, that résistance sourde et active à la fois of English Diplomacy, as the Mémoire of the Messageries Maritimes calls it, which for 10 years from January 1856, to the 19th of March, 1866, prevented the Sultan from ratifying the concession to M. de Lesseps. One would have thought that if ever there was a great work which deserved the patronage of the English Government, it was this Canal, which has shortened the voyage to India by 5,600 miles, and made Egypt the half-way station between Southampton and Bombay. I have never been able to explain to myself what petty and mistaken jealousy prevented us from heartily co-operating in the work, and taking it up as an international enterprise. A third of the expense might have been saved by giving to the project the joint guarantee of the English and French Governments, and encouraging vessels to adopt the transit by levying moderate dues. The undertaking was too vast and speculative for a private company, but as a great international enterprise, I believe the financial ill-success would have been far less, for it is delay in such works that causes expense. I believe too, that the assurance that the Canal would be completed would have induced ship owners to alter the build of their vessels and prepare for the transit of the Canal at an earlier date, and at the end of 1871, instead of a passing tonnage of 766,000 tons register, and an income of £400,000 a year, these figures would have been doubled. Well, Sir, it is a fact that for 10 years the Foreign Office opposed this great, glorious, and beneficent undertaking, in which it has now been clearly shown that we have three times as much interest as all the world besides, for the vessels which pass the Canal under our flag are three times as numerous as those under the flags of other nations, with three times the tonnage. I shall be glad to know now, if the noble Lord will explain it, what the policy of our Foreign Office is to be. The first thing to be decided is, I suppose, whether we have any locus standi at all. The French Commission which sat on the 8th of October, 1871, declared we had not, and repudiated all interference on the part of Foreign Governments with the Company, alleging that it is bound to the Egyptian alone, and as for the rest, "ils ne peuvent être admis à l'interprétation des clauses." In short, after visiting all the English commercial centres, and stirring heaven and earth to obtain their co-operation, M. de Lesseps now says, like a greater man who preceded him in Egypt "Friends, begone; I have myself resolved upon a course. Begone, I say." He declares that within the limits of the concession the Company can do exactly as it pleases, and may quadruple its receipts by declaring that the ton is to be in future a cubic metre, and if this be accepted, there is nothing to prevent its being reduced some years hence to a cubic foot. The very fact that it is attempted to lay down such a principle should induce us to act on the principle obsta principiis, and oppose the levying of a toll on any tonnage but that on which it was first levied, namely, registered, were it not desirable to get rid of registered tonnage altogether. It has been proved, however, that the adoption of registered tonnage, as distinguished from gross tonnage, opens the door to all sorts of fraud. Up to 1867, when the Duke of Richmond exempted "crew space" from tonnage wherever it might be situated, shipowners were in the habit of berthing seamen in unhealthy wet places, to escape paying dues, and of filling up the space that ought to have been kept clear for the men with ship stores and odds and ends. Now it appears from an article on the Admeasurement of Tonnage by Mr. Gray, reprinted from The Nautical Magazine of February, 1871, that we have fallen into the opposite extreme, and that unequal allotments of exempted space are made for berthing crews, and much in excess of what the law requires. When we come to exemptions for engine rooms we plunge at once into a labyrinth of difficulties connected with an absurd system of percentages, whereby "some steamers carry an enormous excess over sailing ships of like net register tonnage, while other steamers cannot carry so much as a sailing ship of the like register." Any one who wishes to see how unfairly the present law operates, has only to consult the article from which I have just quoted. The only way of settling these conflicting claims is to put steamers and sailing vessels on the same footing, and to allow exemptions to neither. On the whole then, I trust that registered net tonnage will be given up, and that what dues are levied will be levied on the gross tonnage without any exemptions, it being insisted of course that the dues shall be moderate so as not to obstruct trade. At the same time it is impossible to acquit M. de Lesseps of dealing unfairly with this matter, or to accept his reasons for making the change. It is clear that in his original estimate to the Viceroy Said Pasha on the 15th of November, 1854, M. de Lesseps calculated on registered tonnage, when he said that 6,000,000 of tons went round the Cape, and that if only 3,000,000 passed the Canal, it would recoup the Company. He and M. Lange visited 13 commercial centres in England in 1856, and they both repeatedly assured the audiences they addressed that toll would be taken on registered not on gross tonnage. From the opening of the Canal on the 17th of November, 1869, to the 1st of July, 1872, the toll was actually taken on registered tonnage, and in his circular to the Chambers of Commerce, of the 23rd of August, 1871, M. de Lesseps admits that the question of taking toll on gross tonnage was a new question in 1870. The reasons also for making the change are plainly insufficient. It is pretended that there were difficulties in levying the toll impartially, because the system of ship measurement differs with different nations. But English vessels make up 75 per cent of the whole tonnage passing through the Canal, and Austria, France, Denmark, and the United States have lately adopted our system of measurement, which would bring up the tonnage, about which there could be no difficulty, to 84 per cent. For the remaining 16 per cent, we may well say with the Advocate-General, M. Hémars—

"Let the Company reduce different tons to the same standard by the help of ready reckoners, and if they fail there is no blame for not accomplishing the impossible."

But admitting that registered tonnage and all exemptions should be given up, I cannot for one moment allow that the Canal Company are to impose increased tolls at their discretion, and make the ton an elastic measurement varying in signification, for the purpose of increasing the Company's dividends. This would be to close the Canal and divert the traffic to the railway, but such is the impecuniosity of the Company, that even the most suicidal and impolitic measures are possible. The question is, how are they to be resisted? Unless we are to put the authority of the Sultan altogether aside, it would seem that the only course is that expressed in the Resolution which has just been moved. Article 18 of the "Firman" of the 22nd of February, 1866, says that—

"Difficulties arising between the company and individuals of any nationality shall be submitted to an Egyptian Court of Justice," and I see that the French writers take this to mean the French Consul's Court in Egypt. If this be so, the only remedy is to abolish the Consular Courts and establish the judicial reforms which were proposed by the International Commission, and which were discussed in this House on the 5th of July last year. The noble Lord the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, then said that the code to be adopted in the new Courts would be ready in six months, and led us to hope that we might see the new system inaugurated before this. I expressed a doubt at the time of any arrangement being made so speedily, and it turns out that I was right. I hope now to hear that there is some prospect of a decision of the question, and though it is a serious matter to give up the capitulations which were granted by Sulaiman to Francis I. in 1535, and then to James I., and which have been our protection from Turkish injustice so long, yet I would fain hope that the proposed mixed Courts would be better than the Consular, and therefore I heartily support and second the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, the Commerce of this Country being so deeply interested in the uninterrupted navigation of the Suez Canal, it is desirable that Her Majesty's Government should at once give its adhesion to the judicial reforms in Egypt, suggested and approved of by the Representatives of all the European Powers, by which tribunals will be created for the better administration of justice in Egypt, and the adjudication of differences which may arise between British Ship-owners and the administrators of the Suez Canal Company."—(Mr. Baillie Cochrane.)

Mr. T. E. SMITH observed that the question under discussion was one which affected materially the interests of the mercantile community of this country. It extended not only to the subject of the dues charged, but to that of the freedom of trade—the ingress and egress to and through the Canal, and the preservation of our communication with our Indian Empire. However mistaken our former policy with reference to the Suez Canal might have been, it was now completed, and it was most important that the navigation should be kept free and open to all nations. They did not ask for the British merchant special privileges, but they did demand that the navigation should be as free to us as to France or any other nation. It was clear that all questions now arising were simply under the jurisdiction of the French Courts, and France was so interested in the Canal that her Courts could not be regarded as wholly disinterested in a question which affected the whole of Europe.

Mr. Eastwick

England contributed three-fourths or four-fifths of the entire traffic of the Canal, and therefore the mercantile community had a right to ask the Foreign Office to take every step in its power to protect their interests, and it was somewhat disappointing that no evidence was visible of any such steps having been taken. The extra tonnage dues which had been charged by the Suez Canal Company he believed to be a totally indefensible charge. The Firman which gave the Company power to charge certain dues gave the power to charge on the ton of capacity—a term which every shipowner in England understood, and in France the ton of capacity was practically identical with what it was in England. He hoped that steps would be taken to prevent the levying of unjust imposts by the Canal Company.

Mr. A. GUEST said, he thought that the Motion was framed somewhat unfortunately, because it put the question too narrowly, for it did not take into consideration the interest of England in reference to India. The subject resolved itself into two branches—the question of tonnage and that of the judicial reforms of Egypt. The Suez Canal Company was a public Company under the Egyptian Government, and unless the judicial reforms were carried out we had no power of interfering at all. It was clear we could not compel the Company to lower their tariff, and the question then remained whether we should push forward these judicial reforms. They had been assented to by all the Powers, and last year the noble Lord (Viscount Enfield) said he hoped that the matter would be brought to a conclusion within six months. Nothing had, however, been done. Our trade to India and the East, which used to be carried round the Cape, was now carried through the Suez Canal. Suppose the Canal were to be suddenly closed. Where should we be then? We should not have a sufficient number of ships of the right class to convey our reliefs to India and to carry on commerce round the Cape. [Mr. T. E. SMITH dissented.] The class of ships that used to carry coals round the Cape was being done away with, and if the Canal were closed the consequences would be exceedingly inconvenient. In case of a war it was doubtful whether we should be able to pass our Indian reliefs through the Canal and along the railway to Suez. Egypt was, he believed, sincere in wishing to have these judicial reforms carried out. It was a mistake, however, to suppose that Egypt was desirous to separate herself from the Porte. The Khedive's desire was to improve the country, and there was every reason for helping Egypt in carrying out these judicial reforms. He trusted that the noble Lord would consider this question as it affected our Indian reliefs, and that he would be able to give the House a satisfactory assurance upon both the branches of this question.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that both the points alluded to were deserving of the attention of the Government—the question of extra dues and the progress of judicial reforms in Egypt. It would, however, have been more advantageous to the interests which the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had at heart, if he had kept these two matters a little more distinct. The hon. Member's Motion, as it appeared on the Paper for the first four weeks of the Session, referred exclusively to the question of how our commercial interests were involved in regard to these extra dues. In some respects, no doubt, the two questions hung together; but with the permission of the House he (Viscount Enfield) would endeavour to keep them separate, and inform them exactly the position in which both of them now stood, and to show that the Foreign Office, through Lord Granville, had not neglected our commercial interests herein. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had correctly stated the facts connected with the original concession. The authority under which the dues were levied was derived from the concessions granted to M. de Lesseps by the Viceroy of Egypt on November 30, 1854, and January 5, 1856, which were incorporated in a Convention between the Viceroy and the Canal Company on February 22, 1866, and confirmed by a Firman of the Sultan of March 19, 1866. The Articles relating to the dues were Articles 14, 15, 16, and 17. The important words in this last Article were the expressions—“maximum de dix francs par tonneau de capacité des navires et par tête de passager.” The question at issue mainly turned upon these words. In pursuance of their powers, the Canal Company issued their first navigation regulation on August 17, 1869. The Canal was opened on the 20th of November, 1869, and from that time up to last year the dues continued to be levied on the tonnage shown in the ships' papers as the net register tonnage. The question then arose as to register tonnage and gross tonnage; what did they respectively mean? He spoke with great hesitation in the presence of hon. Members who were interested in commerce; but he must say that the question of tonnage had not been always of so simple a character as the hon. Member for Tyne-mouth (Mr. T. E. Smith) seemed to think. The original measurement of ships in England appeared to have been by displacement, and was at first limited to colliers sailing from the ports of Northumberland and Durham. In ships thus measured and marked, a ton register represented absolutely a ton weight. By the 6 Geo. I. the method of measurement by tonnage was applied to vessels laden with spirits, and by the 13 Geo. III., c. 74, a rule was laid down for the measurement of the tonnage of all vessels, except those carrying coals and herring fishing-boats. In these Acts the rough-and-ready system of ascertaining displacement by dead weight was abandoned, and a system of mathematical measurement of the size of the vessel substituted. From this time the tonnage of a vessel meant, as it meant now, the internal capacity of the ship. In short, a ton was a unit of measurement of space, consisting, according to the existing law—the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict., c. 104—of 100 cubic feet, and when the tonnage of a British vessel was spoken of it meant the number of hundreds of cubic feet contained within the ship. The first Act for the admeasurement of steam vessels was in 1819—59 Geo. III., c. 5—and provided that in estimating the tonnage a deduction should be made for engine space; hence came the distinction between net register tonnage, commonly called register tonnage, and gross tonnage; the former being the tonnage shown on the steamship's register after this deduction had been made, and the latter the total tonnage without deduction. With regard to the tonnage laws of France and other countries, French tonnage was originally framed on a system of displacement similar to that of England. The measurement of French vessels was provided by the law of November 18, 1837, to be on mathematical principles so as to arrive at the bulk of the ship, thus making the French ton like the English, an unit of space, not of weight. In the United States, Spain, Portugal, Holland, Norway, and Russia the principle of measuring the cubic bulk of the ship was much the same, but the method of working it out was different. The principal maritime countries had thus agreed in principle, but differed in practice. To obviate this difference an international arrangement had been arrived at between Austria, Turkey, Italy, Holland, Denmark, Germany, the United States, and France to adopt English measurements of gross tonnage. By a resolution of March, 1872, the Suez Canal Company determined to levy the dues on a scale which excluded the usual deduction; this change added nearly 50 per cent to the dues. On the 10th of September the Peninsular and Oriental Company forwarded to the Board of Trade a statement of the effects of the new scale of dues on their traffic. From this statement it would be seen that the conditions of these mail and passenger steamers gave the following average results for each ship:—Gross register, 3,210 tons; net register, 2,057 tons; cargo capacity, 1,659 tons; passengers, first-class, 153 tons; passengers, second-class, 48 tons; and that under the original Canal tariff the dues on these vessels would have amounted annually—exclusive of passenger-tolls, towage, and pilotage—to £80,184, while, by the present tariff, these dues were raised to £133,536, also exclusive of passenger-tolls, &c., which continued to be charged as heretofore. It would be perceived, therefore, that, after charging a toll upon every passenger and thus levying dues upon that portion of the ship's tonnage devoted to their use, the Canal Company now charged upon the gross register of 3,210 tons, while the cargo carrying capacity was only 1,659 tons, or 50 per cent less than that which was thus unfairly assessed. The Messageries Maritimes had brought an action against the Company before the Tribunal of Commerce of the Seine, and had obtained a verdict for the repayment of the excess dues with interest. The Porte protested against the jurisdiction of the Court. The Canal Company appealed to a higher Court, and on appeal the verdict had been reversed, the result being in favour of the Canal Company. The Company maintained that, under the terms of the Act of Concession, it was only amenable to the jurisdiction of the French Consular Courts in Egypt or Turkey. The Porte maintained that the Company was Egyptian, and amenable to Turkish or Egyptian Courts. The Turkish Government had admitted that the change in the mode of levying dues was illegal, the sanction of the Porte not having been obtained previously. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Cochrane) was a little severe upon Lord Granville when he assumed that the noble Lord had done nothing on the subject during the last year, for on August 31, 1872, instructions were sent to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople (Sir Henry Elliott), explaining the views of the British Government, and stating that they could not admit the right of the Company to place their own construction on the terms of the concession. That despatch had been communicated to the Maritime Powers interested, and he believed its terms met with their approval. In October the idea of a Conference upon those questions was mooted by the Porte, and that had given rise to various other communications and references. On January 15th in this year the Porte made a formal communication to the British Government for a Commission, to sit at Constantinople or in London, to examine into these disputes. The three points on which an opinion was sought were mentioned in a despatch to Sir Henry Elliott, dated 3rd of March, 1873. They were as follows:—(1.) Proposal of the Porte for a Commission to establish a uniform standard of tonnage; (2.) Course to be pursued as regards a change of dues; (3.) Question of dues to be levied in future. With regard to the first proposal of the Porte, the British Government agreed that a Commission should meet, suggesting that each maritime Power should be represented upon it, that it should decide what deductions should be made, how cargo carrying space should be measured, and that London or Constantinople should be the place of meeting. Preference was given by the Government to London as the place of meeting, because the best maritime and commercial information could be obtained there. He ought to inform the House that Constantinople had been suggested by Austria, and that no decision had been arrived at in the matter, but there was every probability that one of the places which he had named would be selected. With regard to the second point, it had been agreed that the Porte should call upon the Suez Canal Company to take up their original charges; while, on the third part Her Majesty's Government stated that, although they did not refuse to admit the right of the Porte to increase dues itself, they hoped it would not inflict injury on maritime interests by so doing, urging that before any increase was definitively agreed on, the British Government and other maritime Powers might be heard on the subject. Thus much for the case with regard to the Canal Company. As to judicial reforms, when he stated last year that he hoped some satisfactory solution would within six months be arrived at he would have been nearer the mark if he had said ten months. The Commission which had been sitting at Constantinople on the arrangements for carrying out judicial reforms in Egypt had now reported, and the Report would be considered by the Governments interested in order to determine how far its conclusions might be adopted; for the question was not one which could be decided by the British Government alone, but could be determined only by consent of all the Governments after the sanction of the Porte had been pronounced. The reforms, when settled, were, as far as related to civil jurisdiction, tentative for five years, but as regarded criminal jurisdiction—except so far as it might be necessary to obtain respect for the proceedings of the tribunals—any decision was reserved till it was ascertained that the working of the civil jurisdiction after five years should have proved satisfactory. It would, he apprehended, be mischievous for British interests to accept singly the new system which, if rejected by other Powers, would place British subjects at a disadvantage in regard to civil process in Egypt. The Powers represented at this Commission were Great Britain, France, Austria, Germany, Italy, Russia, Belgium, the United States, Holland, Sweden and Norway, and Turkey. Their assent and co-operation must necessarily be given before those judicial reforms could be inaugurated and successfully carried out. If the House passed the Motion of his hon.

Friend (Mr. Cochrane), it would show scant courtesy to the Powers that had worked so cordially with the British Government in the labours of the Commission. Under the circumstances, he hoped his hon. Friend would not think it necessary to press his Motion to a division, and that he would be contented to accept the assurance that, although some little delay might occur, the reforms which had been substantially agreed on by the various Powers were likely to be brought to a satisfactory issue.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the answer of the noble Lord (Viscount Enfield) was much more satisfactory than he had expected. He regretted, however, that the despatches which he had quoted, and which in a great degree justified the position which had been taken up by Lord Granville, had not been laid on the Table of the House. The noble Lord, he might add, was in error in saying that the Commission of 1855 accepted the principle of net, and not of gross tonnage. [Viscount ENFIELD said, he had not alluded to the Commission of 1855.] He (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) then wished to beg the noble Lord's pardon, and to say that after the statement which he had made he should not divide the House on his Motion.

MR. DENISON thanked the noble Lord for the very clear explanation he had just given. It was perfectly clear from what was said by M. de Lesseps, that whatever the contention of our Government and the other maritime Powers might be, his view was that the legal domicile of the Suez Canal was in France, and that we had no power to take a legal decision on this question out of the French Courts.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Education Department under "The Elementary Education Act, 1870," to enable the School Board for London to put in force "The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845," and the Acts amending the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

SHOP HOURS REGULATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bill to provide for regulating the hours of labour of children, young persons, and women in shops

SEDUCTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Eykyn
Mr. Whitwell.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. CHARLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its principal object was to protect young females between the ages of 12 and 14. It was not necessary for him to enter at any length upon an explanation of the measure, because the main proposition was assented to in principle last year, a clause to the same purpose having been contained in his Bastardy Law Amendment Bill of last year, and the second reading of that Bill was agreed to without any objection having been taken to that provision. But at a subsequent stage the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance) having intimated his intention of opposing it, rather than run the risk of losing the whole Bill, he (Mr. Charley) assented to the omission of the clause, intimating at the same time his intention of prosecuting this subject in the next Session. As he had said, the main object of the Bill was to extend protection to girls between the ages of 12 and 14 years. At present the law now afforded the protection he now sought to female children between the ages of 10 and 12; and the 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, contained a clause, which was re-enacted in the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100—the Consolidation Statute relating to Offences against the Person—the abduction of an unmarried person under the age of 16 from the possession and against the will of her parent or guardian was made a misdemeanour. Now, his present object was to make that a statutable offence in respect to females between the ages of 12 and 14, which was not at present an offence at common law. For the necessity of such an enactment he would refer hon. Members to the last Report of the Rescue Society which was presided over by the Earl of Shaftesbury, and which was doing good work in London. The statistics given in this document disclosed a most distressing state of things. The number of young girls who had passed through the institution last year was 540; and a reference to their ages would show how much legislation on the subject was required. He had further to urge as an argument why the House should accept this legislation was, that the amendment of the law was required in the interests, not of the rich, but of the poor. The statutes to which he had already referred made the abduction of an heiress under 21 years of age a felony, subjecting the offender to penal servitude; and surely Parliament would not refuse to the female who was poor and defenceless the protection given to her who was rich and powerful. The clause simply proposed to enact that in the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, the section relating to this offence shall be read as if the words were “twelve” and “fourteen,” instead of “ten” and “twelve.” He had also added a clause by which any owner or occupier of a house harbouring any girl under 16 for the purpose of prostitution should be guilty of a misdemeanour, or should be liable to summary conviction. The Bill contained another provision which, though not the main object of the Bill, was nevertheless of considerable importance. At present, in order to recover compensation for the injury inflicted by seduction, it was necessary to proceed upon a legal fiction—the parent or other next friend of the injured girl, and not the injured girl herself, brought the action on the plea that the damages sought to be recovered were for the loss of her service, and it was necessary to prove some service that could be lost before damages could be recovered. The Judges, indeed, had from time to time ruled that the compensation need not be confined to the actual loss of service, but that the wounded feelings of the parent might be taken into account. This, however, was contrary to the strict reading of the law, and there were on record cases where the Court ruled that there was no redress because the girl was in the service of the defendant himself at the time he seduced her, and that there was no evidence that the father benefited by her service; but the Judges, no doubt, were ready to admit the very slightest evidence of service. In order to set this matter at rest he had introduced a clause which enacted, first, that an action for seduction might be brought by the parent or guardian of the girl seduced, and that it should not be necessary for the plaintiff to aver or prove that the girl was in his service at the time of the seduction, or that he thereby lost her services. This did but follow the ruling of the Judges, and made it clear that the damages were to be given without reference to the loss of services—in fact, abolished that fiction altogether. He did not propose to give any action where it did not now lie, except in the case—the seduction of an orphan minor. Here the Bill proposed that an action for seduction might be brought by a guardian ad litem admitted by the Court to sue. The hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had given Notice of his intention to move the rejection of this Bill. The leaders of the Conservative party had declared that it was the peculiar function of that party to promote measures of social reform, and relying upon that gratifying assurance, he (Mr. Charley) had introduced several measures of that nature, and by the kind indulgence of this and the other House of Parliament had succeeded in passing them into law, and he trusted he should meet with similar indulgence in his present attempt. The hon. Member for Whitehaven, however, appeared to think that the function of the Conservative party was obstruction. The scenes exhibited in our streets were a disgrace to a nation which claimed to stand in the vanguard of the civilized world, and they were a by-word among foreigners. The best way to remedy existing evils was not to prosecute the unhappy women, but to prevent girls from falling; and if a man betrayed the confidence of these young creatures, let him do it at his peril. If he escaped punishment, this House would at least have the satisfaction of interposing a barrier to prevent the committing of this great wrong.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, his main objection to the Bill had nothing to do with its merits at all—this was an attempt to alter the common law of the country, and it was an attempt which ought not to have been made by a private Member, and which ought not to be sanctioned. The alteration in the law, if made at all, ought to be proposed by a responsible Minister of the Crown after consultation with the Judges and the legal officers. There was no reason why the House should be asked to trouble itself with small tinkering of the law which could do no good whatever. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Charley) tried his 'prentice hand last year on the Bastardy Laws, and the only result was that of throwing a number of women with their offspring on the world. The hon. and learned Member, in the Bill now before the House, introduced three new principles—first, a change of the age; secondly, an alteration in the mode of dealing with those who kept disorderly houses; and, thirdly, an alteration in the Common Law with regard to the ground of action mentioned in the latter section of the Bill. If his hon. Friend had confined himself to an alteration of the age he (Mr. C. Bentinck) would not have opposed the proposal, because he believed that such an alteration might very properly be made; but then it ought to be made on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government. As to the second principle of the Bill, the 25 Geo. II. c. 26, provided for such cases, for it enabled two householders to lay information against any person who kept a disorderly house. And if that Act was not sufficient there was the 24 & 25 Vict., which accomplished everything which this section of the Bill proposed to do. As to the third principle, by which an alteration of a very material kind was proposed in the Common Law of the land, he confessed he was unable to follow the logic of the hon.

and learned Gentleman. It was quite plain that the hon. and learned Member had not, in drafting his Bill, consulted an experienced draftsman, who would have been informed that the pretence of referring to former Acts was highly objectionable. The hon. and learned Member said that the loss of service was a mere fiction, and that it did not prevent substantial damages being given; but if that were so, what was the reason for altering the law of the country? This loss of service, which was no bar to a proper action, was an important safeguard against actions which were not proper, and if it were done away with the door would be thrown open to extortion without limit. He could not believe that Her Majesty's Government could assent to the second reading of this Bill. He had quite as strong a desire as the hon. Member for Salford to prevent injuries from being inflicted on anyone, though he did not pretend to indulge in sentimentality, and he had been compelled to adopt his present course by a sense of duty. If Her Majesty's Government would bring in a Bill on their own responsibility he would be willing to acquiesce in any decision that might be come to. He was sorry that the Home Secretary was not in his place, but he would ask the hon. and learned Attorney General to assist him in getting rid of this tinkering Bill. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he always did honour to courage in any hon. Member of this House, and he had before now had reason to respect the courage of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck). He was far from disputing the right of the hon. Member to oppose this or any other Bill, but he lamented that the hon. Member should have selected this for his opposition, and he regretted still more the ground upon which he had rested that opposition—upon the ground, namely, that this Bill had been introduced by an unofficial Member of the House; and he had broadly laid down, that no private Member of the

Mr. Charley

House was entitled to introduce a Bill for the improvement of the social relations of the country. [Mr. C. BENTINCK: I did not say anything of the sort.] At any rate the hon. Member stated, and he appealed to himself to confirm what he said, that this was a subject which ought to be dealt with only by the responsible Ministers of the Crown; and he added that the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) who had introduced the Bill, and other hon. Members who attempt to deal with similar subjects, ought to be considered tinkering Members of the House. He thought, therefore, that the interpretation which he first put upon the whole tenor of the speech of the hon. Member for Whitehaven was true, and that he was not very much mistaken. [Mr. C. BENTINCK: You are mistaken.] In what was he mistaken? The inevitable conclusion from the hon. Member's remarks was that unless the Government introduced amendments of the law on subjects such as this, they ought to be obstructed if introduced by anyone else. ["No, no!"] The hon. Member spoke of the Government as the only responsible body in the House. Every Member of the House was responsible, and the House itself was responsible; and that as much for its omissions in meeting the necessities of society by legislation, as for the errors it might commit in its attempts to legislate. He hoped the House would repudiate the novel theory set up by the hon. Member for Whitehaven. The House had gradually accumulated to itself the chief legislative power in this country, and had also while doing this trenching upon the functions of the Executive, and he held that the House had no right to repudiate the responsibility which it had undertaken. Having thus dealt with the general allegation by which the hon. Member for Whitehaven had attempted to inflict an incapacity on the whole of the unofficial Members of the House, he (Mr. Newdegate) agreed with him thus far—that he thought that too many measures were introduced into this House by unofficial Members. This was a Parliament chosen by a new constituency—it was elected under different circumstances from other Parliaments, and he hoped that the unofficial Members of the House would limit their attempts at legislation to measures which they had reason to believe they were capable of dealing with effectually, and of carrying into law. That was the kind of restriction which he trusted the common-sense of this House would impose—for it was quite as necessary to the efficient action of this House, to the independent action of the House, as the introduction of proper measures. He would now pass to the substance of this Bill. There was a part of it—he alluded to the third clause—which the hon. Member for Salford did not seem disposed to insist upon, and he thought he was quite right. The main purpose of this Bill was the protection of girls under 14 years of age. He would not be squeamish in speaking on this subject, nor would he touch upon those religious considerations which might be very well evoked; but he said this to the House—They knew that in this country there was a great excess of female population; and he asked every man in this House whether there was any excuse whatever for the seduction of these children? That was the plain, manly view to take of this question. Apart from all questions of a strict morality, then, this seduction of children was, in every sense, a gratuitous offence, and it was therefore an offence which ought to be visited by punishment. Years ago he supported his late Colleague Mr. Spooner when he introduced a measure for the restraint of seduction; he had never regretted that he did so, and he should on this occasion support the hon. Member for Salford in following—reasonably and cautiously as he believed—in the footsteps of his late Colleague. The hon. Member for Whitehaven had observed that there were some portions of this Bill which needed to be guarded, and in that he agreed with him. But he felt the force of the objection urged by the hon. Member for Salford, to that practical restriction imposed by the present state of the law, which to a certain extent made service—that was, the engagements of the female—to be a condition inseparable from an action on account of her seduction. There could be no question that this fiction had been the occasion of very great abuse. But the House should remember that the principle of this Bill was not so much directed to the repression of that class of crime—that its primary object was the protection of mere children. He thought the case for this Bill was amply made out—that it was for the protection, to a certain extent, of all women, but chiefly for that of children. The hon. Member for Whitehaven said that there was one provision of the Bill which would enable some other persons than the parents to appear as their legally constituted defenders, and that that might lead to abuse. Well, it would be the business of the hon. Member for Whitehaven and the House to see that such provisions were introduced into the Bill, when in Committee, as should guard against any such malpractices by scoundrelly attorneys. But there was another provision imported into other Acts of Parliament which he thought this Bill needed. He thought it ought to contain a clause requiring that the evidence of the child or woman who had been seduced, or who pleaded that she had been injured, should in some manner be corroborated. He thought that this would be a very proper provision to introduce into the Bill when it got into Committee; but he rejoiced in the belief that this House would not, on the Motion for its second reading, reject this Bill, which had been prepared by a competent Member of this House for the protection of mere children from the practices of vile seducers.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, he could not admit the validity of the objection which had been urged by the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) that this Bill was brought forward by a private Member instead of the Government; for nearly all questions of social legislation during the last 30 years had been initiated by private Members. He appealed to the House whether the Factory Acts and numerous other Acts for the amelioration of the social condition of the people were not brought in by the present Lord Shaftesbury when he was a private Member. Nor could he agree that the flaw which had been discovered in the Bastardy Law Amendment Act of last Session was a defect which belonged to the measure as originally introduced by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley). It was entirely owing to the hasty and harassing mode of legislation pursued at 2 o'clock in the morning. While he remained a Member of that House he hoped he should be regarded as one of what the hon. Member for Whitehaven called the "tinkering Members." He had placed his name on the back of this Bill mainly for this reason—because its clauses were directed to the better protection of children against seduction. He entirely endorsed the noble and manly speech of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). With every word that fell from that hon. Member he entirely agreed. He had some doubts as to the 4th clause of the Bill, but with respect to the first three clauses he could not see what objection could be made to them. He had sat on the Royal Commission with reference to Contagious Diseases, and there were certain points on which the Commissioners were perfectly unanimous in recommending an alteration of the law. The 59th section of their Report, and the final recommendation it contained had immediate reference to the evils dealt with by the first three clauses of this Bill. He might refer to the evidence of the Chief Constable of Portsmouth and the Matron of Devonport Hospital to show that the ranks of prostitution were recruited from mere children, and might mention as a fact that at Plymouth there were more than 300 children from 12 to 15 on the streets at one time. It had been brought to his notice again and again as an employer of labour that mere children of 12, 13, and 14 years were seduced by men of double their years and in a better position of life. A fearful amount of seduction was going on daily, not only between masters and servants, but in dancing saloons, and other sinks of vice in large towns. In factory towns it was heart-rending to see young girls of 15 who had been seduced, and were about to become mothers. Was it reasonable that while the Factory Act prevented a child from working more than half time till she was past 13, she should be held competent, according to the present theory of the law, to assent to her own seduction at the age of 12? If they were to be treated as children of tender age in one case they ought in another. This was peculiarly a question for the poor. The rich could take care of their children, and they knew what precautions were taken to hedge them round and prevent them from being contaminated by the sights and sounds of great cities, while the young daughter of a poor mechanic, or labourer, had to encounter all the dangers of the streets in going to and from her work, often late at night, and therefore every possible protection ought to be thrown over her by the law. It was quite notorious that a large proportion of the prostitutes in towns were children under 16, and the various police inspectors examined before the Committee on this subject expressed their unhesitating opinion that they were inveigled into brothels by the old prostitutes. He implored the House to pass this Bill, amended if they liked in Committee, so as to give some additional protection to children at all events. He did not consider the other parts of the Bill of such importance; but he should rejoice if anything could be done to lessen the terrible evil that now existed.

MR. STRAIGHT said, he hoped that the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time, and in saying that he must add that he strongly deprecated the proposition propounded by the hon. Member for Whitehaven, that, in social reforms of the important character contemplated by the present measure, private Members were not to interfere by propounding schemes for legislation. It was a new principle for the guidance of the House he was not prepared to adopt, that when the hands of Government happened to be so full, individual Members competent for the task were not at least to attempt the alteration or removal of defects found to exist in the administration of the law. The hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) deserved the warmest approval for his present effort, and while his Bill was in many respects inartistic and faultily drawn, it was undoubtedly a step in the right direction. As to the second clause, it was open to the well-grounded criticism of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck), who justly enough appreciated the difficulty and confusion that must inevitably arise from framing a section in one Act with a reference, for the purpose of construing it, to a clause in some preceding statute. It was most unfair and worrying to the Judges who had to administer the law, and entailed both upon them and others concerned in the administration of justice endless and unnecessary trouble. This, however, was a defect that could be amended in Committee, and did not go to the essence of the Bill. Putting the proposal into plain English, what it contemplated was, that a child of 12 should not be a woman for the purpose of giving her consent to offences upon her, but that up to 12 and 14 such offences should respectively be felonies and misdemeanours whether she consented or not. As the law at present stood, the Judges, in a natural and laudable desire to protect young creatures of so tender an age as 12, were disposed to construe the most slender evidence as indicative of non-consent. If, however, the limit were placed at 14, there would be far less likelihood of a tendency in this direction. Anything that could be done to check this wicked, and it was to be feared, far too prevalent offence of debauching young girls was a step that the House, even at the instigation of a private Member, might well undertake. In reference to the third section, he (Mr. Straight) presumed that what the hon. and learned Member for Salford contemplated was to give a less technical and more summary mode of procedure for the purpose of punishing those who, without bringing themselves within the operation of the 25th of George II., carried on a most nefarious traffic, that filled the streets of great towns and supplied their places of public resort and amusement with recruits. As things at present stood, great difficulty and expense presented themselves in the way of a prosecution, and it was often impossible to obtain that evidence of a public nuisance which would sustain an indictment. This clause of the Bill had many defects, and would require considerable alteration, but it might be turned into a tangible and practical shape. It was to be expected that on the fourth section there would be considerable difference of opinion, but in principle the view of the hon. and learned Member for Salford was right. At a glance it was an obvious anomaly, that a woman having sustained the personal injury of seduction should have to sue by some other person—either her parent or her master—and that before she could recover damages such parent or master was bound to show loss of service by reason of such wrongful act of the defendant. The result of this was to be found in numerous decisions in the law books, where in cases, no doubt disclosing great hardship, the Judges had leaned to an elasticity of construction, that, for instance, had led to the making of tea being regarded as a service sufficient to meet the demands of the law and to justify a plaintiff to recover. He (Mr. Straight) looked at the question from no sentimental point of view, but he held that it would be far better to establish some legal landmarks of a practical and common sense character by which Judges might hereafter be guided. To him it seemed that the far better course would be to make the action for seduction a personal action to be brought by the woman herself, and to require her, as in actions for breach of promise and in proceedings for bastardy orders, to find corroboration. While he could not accept without reserve the proposal upon this point made by the Bill, he would unhesitatingly vote for the second reading, in the hope that the subject might be fully and carefully considered, and that some fair and intelligible alternative might present itself which would put an end to a great social as well as legal anomaly.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that notwithstanding the severe remarks of the hon. Member for Whitehaven on the neglect of the Law Officers of the Crown in not proposing legislation on this subject, and for their general ill-success in the legal measures they did propose, he could not take on himself the responsibility of objecting to the second reading of this Bill. Indeed, one of the clauses of the Bill was copied from the Bill introduced by the Government last year, and therefore whatever objection existed as to the phraseology of the clause was equally good against the Government clause. The first alteration of the law provided in the second clause was a decided improvement of the existing law. The present law drew a distinction between the offence of an improper connection with a girl under 10 years, and one between that age and 12 years—the former being a felony punishable with penal servitude or two years imprisonment with hard labour, and the latter a misdemeanour; and in neither case was the consent of the girl held to have any effect on the criminality of the offender; and the present Bill proposed to extend the ages to 12 years and 14 years respectively. The first of these alterations was an improvement in the law of which he (the Attorney General) warmly approved. At the same time, he thought the better course would be—instead of making the alteration in a special Act relating to Bastardy to alter the 24 & 25 Victoria, which was the Consolidation Statute relating to offences against the person—so as to make the alteration a part of the known criminal code of the land. He fully shared in the noble sentiments and manly feelings of the hon. Members for North Warwickshire and Nottingham, but he was sorry to say that as a lawyer he was unable to give his support to the second alteration—that which raised the age from 12 years to 14. And his reason was this—the law of England—and indeed the law of all the European nations—fixed the age at which persons were competent to consent to marriage at 12 for women and 14 for men. That being a well-known and clearly established principle of English law he was not prepared to make sexual connection with a girl over 12 years a criminal offence where the girl was a consenting party. With respect to the third clause—that which made it a misdemeanour to harbour girls under 16 for the purposes of prostitution—the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) was in error in saying that the present law was sufficient. The present law was intended to deal—and no doubt to some extent did deal successfully—with disorderly houses. But the object of the present clause was to prevent, so far as it could be prevented, the harbouring of young girls for the purposes of prostitution. This was a traffic which might be carried on without any obvious outrage of decency; but while he admitted it would not be very easy to put it into effect, this particular clause was directed against a real evil which no existing law touched; and he could not take on himself the responsibility of refusing to read it a second time. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had fallen into an unintentional error in speaking of the age at which girls were constantly consigned to prostitution in our great towns. He had greatly exaggerated the extent to which girls of tender age were engaged in prostitution in our streets. In all the towns where the Contagious Diseases Acts had been in operation the traffic in girls of that age was absolutely at an end. He felt it was very important that this statement should be made. So much for the first two portions of the Bill. With regard to that part of it which related to actions for seduction, he was not prepared to give it his support. An action for seduction was an anomalous proceeding, and the law in that respect was not in a satisfactory state—it was founded manifestly on a fiction which was contrary to common sense. The law was—You must show some kind of service and loss of service in order to found the action; but that done, the damages need not be limited to the loss of service. Sixpence might cover the injury sustained from loss of service, and the damages of £10,000 be awarded for injury to the feelings. He would not stand up for such a state of the law; but if they were to alter it, he would prefer doing so in this way:—The action should be at the suit of the woman herself; but he would not give a right of action for what he might call an ordinary seduction—that is, an improper intercourse between a young man and a young woman—an action should not be allowed or maintained except where there had been on the part of the man something like fraud or violence. There were many cases in which women had obtained verdicts where they had not taken proper care of themselves. The more we made a woman feel that she was to look after herself and not yield to inducements to go wrong, the better in his judgment would it be for the whole female sex. If he could alter the law he would alter it in the direction he had indicated. The alteration now proposed seemed to be in the wrong direction; for, though it got rid of one particular fiction, loss of service, it would encourage fictitious actions, and so open the door to abuse. He would rather repeal the present law, and pass another based on sounder principles, than alter the existing law in a wrong direction. While assenting to the second reading of the Bill, he gave the hon. Member fair notice of what was implied in that assent.

MR. A. EGERTON supported the second reading of the Bill, with some hesitation, because hon. Members scarcely knew what it was they were discussing. The second section of the Bill was to be re-modelled, the third was to be withdrawn, and the fourth was to be materially altered; so that the House was now placed at a serious disadvantage as to the actual proposals that were to be embodied in the Bill. No one could doubt the serious nature of the grievance proposed to be remedied, but the proposed change in respect of age was a serious one, and ought not to be made without great consideration.

MR. CANDLISH was glad to hear that the Government intended to support the second reading of the Bill, though he regretted that the Attorney General had shown hostility to the second part of the second clause, which raised the age at which consent could be given, from 12 to 14 years. He hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman would yet be able to see his way to the acceptance of the provision.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, they ought clearly to understand what they were doing. He understood that the assent of the Government was given to that part of the second section which involved the principle that up to the age of 12 no consent should be legal. It was quite true there might be grievous cases of hardship above that age; but still it was necessary to be cautious in going further. No one would wish to prevent any proper interference with immoral trading; but the clause relating to this subject would require to be made more accurate and definite. In such measures they should not look merely to philanthropy, but the House would do well to consider the moral effect of legislation which went too far. There were no trials for seduction which did not do more harm than good; and, if convictions were secured, the fact that some suffered did not check others whose imaginations and passions were aroused by the details of the trials. It was difficult to keep the Courts clear of young men, and women were sometimes only kept out by forcibly excluding them. An increasing number of these cases would be the means of increasing the evil. We must not, for the sake of punishing the seducer, encourage young women to rely upon legal compensation. It was not the really virtuous who were ready to expose their shame; and there was at least danger that hon. Gentlemen with the best intentions would only encourage the vicious. He hoped such would not be misled by the desire to do what was morally right into promoting measures which would encourage what was morally wrong.

MR. EYKYN, whose name was on the back of the Bill, said, he believed its operation would be beneficial, and that it would do something to remove a blot and a stain upon our civilization. He had recently visited the East-end of the metropolis, and he could say with confidence that the legislation would prove beneficial in that quarter. He hoped the hon. Member for Whitehaven would not put the House to the trouble of dividing.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that as his case seemed to be admitted by the House and by the Government, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

METROPOLIS BUILDINGS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 54.]

(Dr. Brewer, Mr. W. M. Torrens, Mr. McArthur, Mr Locke.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. BREWER, in asking the House to read a second time the Bill for amending the 55th clause of the 7 & 8 Vict., c. 84, which he had had the honour to lay before them, said he had felt great confidence that, unless he failed signally in his simple narrative of the facts and history of the case, he should carry the House with him. In the year 1844 the Government of the day entrusted the then Lord Lincoln to bring in and conduct through the House a Bill for the regulation of buildings, new and old. It consisted of 120 clauses; it contained 15 closely printed pages of Schedules, with 8 lithograph diagrams, all referring to the height and thickness of the walls of warehouses and private dwellings. In the 55th clause of the Act, however, by the abrupt introduction of four words in the 7th line, one of the three methods by which the metropolis was supplied with meat—namely, by animals bought by the retail butcher, and kept by him in his private lairage, to be slaughtered as and when required to supply demand—was, after the expiration of 30 years, to be abolished. He asked any experienced Member of the House whether legislation vitally affecting the food supply of this metropolis could be fairly dealt with, stifled by a position so cramped as this? This section of the 55th clause would come into operation next year (1874). It was a bold prophecy of the Government of the day to affirm what was to take place in 30 years' time—a bold forecast to pass a sumptuary law, with this simple disadvantage above others of its class, that it prejudicially and not beneficially affected the cost of living of the common people—a law interfering with a trade of primal supply and demand—a law to come in force 30 years after its enactment, and this without a single provision for rendering the carrying of the law into effect practicable. His case did not require him to deny, but to acknowledge the gross and flagrant neglect of needful sanitary precautions and conditions, of social conveniences and the duties of humanity which led to the outcry against intramural slaughter-houses. He took part in that outcry. That the private and public slaughter-houses, as they then existed, must be dealt with by the Legislature the metropolis felt and demanded. But how dealt with? By means of extermination, as contemplated by this clause, or by the means suggested both by the Select Committee to whom the House referred this subject in 1866, and in conformity to suggestions made by a Committee some 12 years before, and on whose Report the Government took action, resulting in the creation of a system of inspection and licensing, with jurisdiction given to local governing bodies in conjunction with the magistrates in petty session, empowering them to grant or to refuse licences to any private or other slaughter-house which was unsuited for that object, or to discriminate and licence either for the killing of beasts or sheep, as to them seemed suitable—a system confessedly beneficial, and, wherever carried out faithfully and in the true spirit of the Act—absolutely and undeniably successful. It need not be dwelt on here that in some parts of the metropolis the local governing bodies did not appear to have been educated up to the required standard, and that sheds had been recommended for licence to the magistrates, ill-adapted for the purpose. This was, perhaps, a blot in the Act, but one easily hit and easily erased. What would be easier than to require the magistrates, as they acted in granting or renewing the spirit-dealer's licence by calling in the police attached to the district to ascertain the character of the houses in question; so in granting or renewing licenses for slaughter-houses to call in the medical officers of health and Inspectors, and in any doubtful case to require the shed to be visited, withholding the licence till the report of the visitors was received, and then dealing with the case summarily. Add any further security of additional conditions precedent to application for the licence, as to apparatus, ventilation, and other accommodation, and all these private slaughter-houses would be, what the vast majority already were, as clean and wholesome as any private gentleman's kitchen or larder. But these useful amendments to the Licensing Act were rendered impossible, till the House had dealt with this section of the 55th clause. It was on other grounds also impossible to continue the clause as it stood. The endless litigation it would entail, the great uncertainty felt by legal men as to the meaning of this clause, taken in conjunction with the 56th and 58th clauses—the doubt as to the interpretation of the terms used, must lead to the repealing of this part of this section. If the House would look at the 56th clause, they would see that it purported to give direction to the trade how they were to proceed to obtain a suspension of judgment, a mitigation of penalty, or, even in conjunction with the 57th clause, immunity from prosecution in carrying on their trade, perhaps; but the 56th clause was so obscure that, as he was advised, the legal profession could not come to a decision as to what interpretation to put on it. He had in his hand the opinion of two of the most eminent counsel in London, that of Mr. Manisty and Mr. Poland, in relation to part of Clause 56, which he would read to the House—"We have carefully considered the first enactment in Section 56, and are unable to give any meaning to it." And as to Clause 58, which enabled the prosecuted butcher to have the matter tried by a jury, there was no little obscurity as to what was to be submitted, whether the fact, or the law, or, further, the function of legislation. Then, as to the appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench. Was it intended that Court should decide whether each of the 1,100 butchers who were to be brought before the Court had done all that science had directed to render their trade innocuous, and, if so, whether they were to go a step further and say to the Court below—"Your interpretation of the law is right, but you shall not carry out your sentence?" A pretty trap for a class of tradesmen!

A position intolerable! The House could hardly, in this view, reject his (Dr. Brewer's) Bill. No man could have made himself acquainted with the operation of the system of inspection and licensing without admitting that, in this direction, the Legislature have proceeded with marked success, and that if in parts of Westminster, the City, and south and east of the metropolis, the system had partially failed, the failures were attributable to the neglect of the Inspectors or local governing bodies. Of course, if Inspectors, not altogether uninfluenced, have set their minds on abolishing the live meat markets altogether, and of driving the metropolis into the dead meat supply exclusively, it cannot be surprising that they should fail to see the force of that evidence, which the Select Committee of the House, whatever their private predilections, could not withstand. This only would he add, that he could name men of high repute in sanitary science who perfectly agreed in his assertion of the success in a sanitary point of view of the action of the Legislature in passing the Licensing Acts, and in the conclusion of the Select Committee, that private slaughter-houses—if well kept—were not injurious to the public health. It was not wonderful after what he had said that the Building Act of 1844 found no favour in the House; accordingly they saw that in 1855 the Legislature repealed 111 out of the 120 clauses of which the Act consisted, and in 1866 referred the subject-matter of this section of the 55th clause to a Select Committee consisting of 21 Members, with the following Order of the House—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on 'Trade in Animals' that they enquire how far it is desirable to prevent, restrict, or regulate the slaughter of animals in the metropolis, or other populous places, and to report their opinion thereon to the House."

The Committee consisted of Mr. Milner Gibson, Lord Naas, Lord Cranborne, Mr. Graham, The O'Connor Don, Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Banks Stanhope, Mr. Graves, Mr. Alderman Salomons, Mr. Edward Egerton, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Cogan, Mr. Carnegie, Mr. Dent, Mr. Holland, Mr. Leader, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton, Sir James Fergusson, and Sir Morton Peto—Gentlemen of great influence, and representing all views and all interests on the subject. In the 13th paragraph of the Report of

that Select Committee, it was declared that "the live meat markets are not unhealthy in themselves, nor are slaughter-houses, if well kept, injurious to the public health." Although they had a tendency to aggregate round them trades which were objectionable. Here, then, fell to pieces the whole groundwork on which this prohibition in the 55th clause, in relation to retail butchers' private slaughter-houses was founded, for it so happened that the clause was preceded by a Preamble, alleging the reason for the prohibition of the trades contained in the clause—

"And now for the purpose of making provision concerning businesses offensive or noxious, be it enacted with regard to the following businesses:—Blood-boiler, bone-boiler, fellmonger, scap-boiler, tallow-melter, tripe-boiler, slaughterer of cattle, sheep, or horses. . . . from the expiration of 30 years, it shall cease to be lawful to carry on such business within such distances, &c."

This business of butcher's private slaughter-house the Select Committee of the House declared "not to be injurious to the public health" itself; but it was in this clause classed arbitrarily with businesses both offensive and objectionable, and further it was no less arbitrarily coupled with the knacker's trade, to which in every essential particular it was antagonistic. Why tie the butcher to the knacker? Cattle and sheep were killed for human sustenance; they were given for food to man by Him who had the right so to dispose of them. They were killed to support the existence and re-invigorate the exhausted strength of man—that was the express object for which they were bred and reared. Was it so with horses? Were they not killed because they were diseased, for the most part; never, surely, in fulfilment of the object for which they were reared? It mattered little how far from human habitation tallow was melted, blood and bones were boiled, or horses were slaughtered, but it made all the difference in the world, especially to the humbler stratum of society, whether the flesh they depended on for their sustenance—their meat supply on the only day in the week perhaps on which they could afford the luxury, were fresh, wholesome, and attainable, which it would not be if private slaughter-houses were abolished. Up to this time the metropolis had been supplied by three methods—1st, by country killed meat—the dead meat market; 2ndly, by meat slaughtered in London by carcase butchers, who sent it to the wholesale markets; and 3rdly, by meat slaughtered in London, as and when required, by retail butchers in their private slaughter-houses, all now duly inspected and licensed, to meet immediate or known demands. The House must be under no misapprehension as to the position in which London would immediately find herself if this part of the 55th clause of the old Act were not virtually repealed—namely, in the substitution of one source of supply, and that the least reliable, for the three sources now and from time immemorial enjoyed by this metropolis. He was warranted in saying that few persons comparatively seemed to know or realize what the dimensions of this metropolis really were, and what the magnitude of the question before them. They read letters in the Press affirming that London covers an area of 10 square miles—again, that it contained little short of 100,000 houses; and in the Select Committee a Member of great experience and weight in the House, Question 5013, said—

"I asked the question upon the supposition not that there is to be one public slaughter-house, but that there are to be distinct slaughter-houses, and that they will be within a mile or two."

Schemes had been proposed, in many cases, on the hypotheses to which he (Dr. Brewer) had referred. But what were the real factors of this sum? What was the actual state of the case? Why, that London covers not an area of 10 square miles, but of 117 square miles. And was this metropolis, with its area of 117 square miles and a population of 3,500,000—the largest meat consumers in Europe—to be tied down to the dead meat market alone? His hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) saw this clearly enough, for he stigmatized his as a retrograde policy, in seeking by his Bill to discourage the dead-meat market scheme for the metropolis; but there must exist no doubt on that score. Let him ask why the carcase butcher's trade should be tolerated when the retail butcher's trade in his own fresh-killed meat was abolished? Nay, the Report of the Select Committee would by the House be deemed conclusive on this head, for finding fault with the existing practice of the carcase butchers. In Paragraph 16 the Committee added—

"The slaughter-houses of retail butchers stand on a different footing; their abolition would cause great hardship to many butchers, who have slaughter-houses adjoining their shops, and can slaughter animals as they require them under their own superintendence."

But the objection went much further than to carcase butchers; it extended also to public abattoirs in very large towns altogether. The Select Committee, under evident misapprehension of the nature of the evidence he was about to tender, brought up a witness from Liverpool, whose complaint was that the whole neighbourhood of the public slaughter-house there was rendered noxious by reason of the effluvia and decomposition going on, consequent on the number of animals brought together to be killed, and the neglect to remove the blood and other matter which found their way into the public sewers, and caused increase of fever and other zymotic diseases. One leading Member of the Committee got out of the witness that the district was suffering great deprivation consequent on loss of employment, which the witness seemed unable fully to appreciate, but the House would. The mortality in Liverpool in the decade 1851 to 1860 had been 33·32 per 1,000, or 100 to 3,000. In the year preceding his evidence it appears to have risen to 37. In 1872, however, it fell to 27·00 per 1,000 (81 in 3,000), owing to the more prosperous trade and condition of the people. London, from 1851 to 1860, had a mortality of 27·76 per 1,000; but in 1872 it fell to 21·40 per 1,000. But if disease be due to private slaughter-houses, it was London which should have had the high mortality, and not Liverpool; because London, and not Liverpool, had in it 1,100 private slaughter-houses, and Liverpool had not one. To revert once more to the dead meat market. From the evidence, and even from the Report of the Select Committee, it was clear beyond dispute that London could not be adequately supplied with meat from this source alone, for although in cool and fresh seasons of the year, London, at enhanced prices, could be supplied to a great extent with dead meat, yet in hot and sultry weather—a period extending over three months fitfully—London could not depend on the dead meat market. The evidence was irresistible that there were seasons where-in meat became tainted, within the eight or ten hours after being killed required for the "setting of the flesh," and then on the butchers' private slaughter-houses not his customers alone, but the whole trade of the metropolis mainly, if not wholly, depended for their supply of fresh, wholesome meat. Mr. Butler gave evidence that in transmitting a consignment of meat from Aberdeen to London in the month of May he lost by heat 978 stone; and being asked if it was a very uncommon occurrence for him, his reply was—"It occurs frequently through the year." He need not remind the House that it was the movement or friction of the fleshy particles which caused decomposition; and that the setting of the carcase was indispensable to its being moved with safety. In hot weather some of the finest fat beasts—short-horns weighing 1,200lbs and over, and worth to the butcher in his own lairage £35—were known to set very imperfectly, especially if crowded into a confined area with many hundreds of other beasts, huddled together by mere slaughtermen, who had no regard for the ultimate condition of the meat and no interest in its sale. And here he must notice a most gratuitous charge against a whole class of London tradesmen—namely, that of cruelty to the animals they had purchased for their private slaughter-houses. That would be sheer suicidal folly. No man pursued evil as evil, and for its own sake, in direct opposition to his interest and the strongest motives which could influence human actions. If a short-horn in fine condition were over-driven only half-an-hour the flesh set badly and the market was lost. If the beast had a bruise—and it bruised very easily—the joint in which it occurred was unsaleable. Surely, they would take the best security for good treatment in the interest the man had in the comfort and ease of his beast no less than in the pride he felt in the condition of the meat which he displayed in his shop front. The still more incredible statement that retail butchers objected to the doing away with their slaughter-houses because they were now enabled, undetected, to purchase and slaughter diseased beasts was easily disposed of. First, he asked, where was it that the rejected contract meat—the skin of which, like a fine layer of parchment, tightened on the shrivelled flesh—came from? Invariably, in his experience, from the dead meat supply. It was notorious that breeders and feeders did not care to send their best meat when they knew that the worst would happen to their cattle either at the port, or at many miles from their purposed destination or market. There were no means of telling, save very generally, whether meat sent to the dead meat market was killed in the early stages of disease, because the journey dulled the "bright gloss" of all dead meat, whereas there was no better security against the purchase of diseased meat than on obtaining it from the retail butchers' private slaughter-houses; because the rest the beast obtained in the private "lairage" allowed the disease, if it existed, to develop, and the carcass lost its market; its condition was obviously and apparently deteriorated, and as to its escaping undetected, this was incredible on every score. He had said that to a great extent London could be supplied with dead meat in cool and temperate seasons, but only at enhanced prices. They must examine into the causes of this enhancement. First, there was the reason given in the Report of the Select Committee—

"Compulsory slaughter at a port, like compulsory slaughter at a market, is more expensive to the butcher, hampers the trade, and will raise the price to the consumer."

But, further, the Select Committee of 1866 examined Mr. Salmon—manager of the traffic in the cattle department of the South-Western Railway—who stated that—

"The railway could never carry dead meat so reasonably as it did live meat, in consequence of the double portage required for dead meat, and the loss and risk in transport incurred by the managers. The carriage of one ton of dead meat from Liverpool to Manchester," he added, "costs 18s., whereas a waggon for seven beasts costs only 15s. 6d. Live meat," he said, "cannot deteriorate to the extent dead meat does in transit, and this results from the simple fact of the flesh being moved."

But, correct as this observation was, other witnesses bore testimony to the injuries sustained by dust, and the smoke from the funnel finding its way through the venetians of the meat vans. Witnesses further stated that the packing of several carcasses in sacks generated heat, which accelerated decomposition. In the conclusion at the end of the evidence the Select Committee drew attention to the fact that "the trade generally objected to a dead meat system, that the supply was too irregular to be relied on;" and that the consignees lost their market through this irregularity; and that this extended to the condition of the meat as much as to the time at which it was received. They stated that they had hitherto met this irregularity by buying cattle and keeping them alive in their private "lairs" to slaughter when required. Meat so dealt with was worth more by 30s. a-head than if obtained at the public markets. In Answer (4,568), Mr. Giblett estimated the loss from this source alone, weekly, on 6,000 beasts, 30,000 sheep, 5,000 calves, and 1,000 pigs, to be £14,000. He had there omitted the 15,000 lambs killed weekly during spring. "Of course," he added, "this loss must fall on the consumer." A further enhancement consisted in a practice, well known in the trade, of passing the meat nominally through successive hands, each requiring a percentage—a practice, in the event of a panic, likely to prove most expensive to the trade, and, consequently, to the consumer. But the most serious loss, and consequent cause of enhancement, whether we considered it in its direct deprivation of numerous families of their meat in a fresh and unobjectionable condition, or in its ultimate effect of rendering the whole meat supply dearer, was the loss of what was technically known as the offal, by which was included all the esculent parts of the animal except the two sides. He was informed the offal of 20 sheep would afford food, which, when fresh killed, was much sought after, for 100 individuals. When they considered the relation in which those customers stood to others, they found that they were dealing with little less than 250,000 persons, many of whom were dependent on that food for their weekly meal. Now, it was plain from the evidence, and admitted by the Report of the Select Committee, that this mass of food was lost to this metropolis, if they deprived it of its live meat markets, as this offal did not pay for being moved. The demand for it was greatest on Saturday night; the customers waited about the butchers' shops, and, if they could not be supplied at the time, they were informed at what hour the butcher intended to kill, when they again applied, and were able to procure it. By refusing his (Dr. Brewer's) Bill, the House would be cutting off the meat supply of thousands of families to whom occasional animal food was a necessity, whilst, unfortunately, it was a rare luxury. The alternative plan, in place of that actually in operation, was a system of public slaughter-houses established at proper intervals throughout the metropolitan area. Paris proper, said a popular itinerary which had gone through many editions, contained 52,000 inhabited houses. He should think this statement was much under the mark. London, said a writer in the public Press, contained nearly 100,000 inhabited houses; that he knew was ludicrously wrong. This metropolis in 1872 contained 417,348 inhabited houses, of which 243,697 had been built since 1849. The table was of new houses since 1849, 243,697; new streets, 6,277; new squares, 70; number of miles added, 1,111. The metropolis of 1873 was not the same with that of 1844. It was more extensive than 1844 was over the metropolis of 1664, which contained 65,000 houses; and they had no reason to believe it would be less like its former self in 1904 (30 years hence). The metropolis in 1844 consisted of about 142,908 inhabited houses; to which there had been subsequently added about 274,440, and 1,311 miles of streets, consisting of about 7,400 new streets. Paris proper contained 1,800,000 of population; this metropolis contained 3,500,000. Paris had three large and two smaller abattoirs. The foulness of their condition was attested by some of the French themselves, who said they could smell them for several miles distance. They constituted colonies of the largest, fiercest, and fattest rats seen in France. The population of slaughter-men were the wildest and the most dangerous to social tranquillity in Paris. What number of abattoirs would London require? The amount of animal food taken per head in London exceeded that of any other European capital, and the number of those in proportion to the population attending the meat shops was also greater. England, of all flesh, consumed per head 136 lbs., of which 78½ lbs. was beef. France, of all flesh, consumed per head 46½ lbs.; Prussia, 35½ lbs.; South Italy, under 27 lbs. If nine square miles of inhabited houses would require at least one public slaughter-house, then the 117 square miles of the metropolis would exact 13 abattoirs. There must in the whole metropolis be 2,200 compartments, at least, for retail butchers' meat. Proper railway communications and roads; access for 2,200 carts; lairage for 8,000 bullocks, 30,000 sheep, 15,000 calves, 17,000 lambs, and 2,000 pigs—these were some of the essentials for the requisite abattoirs. How a number of abattoirs within the 117 square miles, not more than from two to three miles from the shops of retail butchers throughout the metropolis, was to diminish the evil of driving cattle through its streets, it would be hard to show. But where were these public abattoirs? Where were they to be placed? Where were the funds to purchase the sites and construct the needful buildings to come from? One of his stoutest opponents had suggested that the butchers must pay for them; but was not that saying that the mass of consumers must, by enhancement of the price of meat, pay both the butcher's cost and his risk? Where, then, was the substitute for the two sources out of the three by which the metropolis had been hitherto supplied? The whisper was—the Metropolitan City Market. But where were the approaches; where the provision for the demands of trade and for the convenience of purchasers? No unprejudiced person in the City even assumed that their market was, or could be, by any outlay adequate; the radical defect being the approaches, which must ever seriously impair the general usefulness of this market. They had seen what a small excess of demand over supply could do, in any article of primal necessity, to create panic and raise its price three-fold in coals. Out off two out of the three sources of supply on which this metropolis depended for meat, and what was that but to enact that none but the wealthiest should be privileged to purchase food in the capital? It was merely trifling with the people of this metropolis to point to Edinburgh or some Continental capitals as examples to be followed. No parallel between Edinburgh and London could be drawn, save for the sake of contrast. In situation, easy access, the neighbourhood of its mountain pastures, in its nearness to the sea, in its streets, down which the breeze travelled accelerated by the narrowing of the valley by the Calton Hill, the Castle Hill and Arthur's Seat. Then, the mean temperature, the prevailing cool winds, its cattle hill-born and hill-reared, their size and compactness—the carcase being cool and easily set—form together a simple contrast in every particular to London and its neighbourhood. He did not desire to prove too much. He asked what his opponents were bound to show to the House in order to defeat the second reading of his Bill? Not that some other method than that into which demand had moulded the present means and method of supply was practicable—not even, to some minds, preferable—but that the present mode of conducting the trade was inconsistent with the health of the community, and that nothing short of its total abolition and suppression could satisfy these primal requirements; but that they had not shown and could not shew, for the House had the verdict of the authority it deemed of highest credibility—namely, that of a Select Committee—a verdict based on evidence absolutely irrefragable, that the butcher's private slaughter-house was not a trade injurious to the health of the people. But, it was urged, there were accidents to which the trade was obnoxious, such as the tendency of other trades to gather round it which were objectionable or offensive, and that if the houses were not well kept they were noxious. But could either or both of these be valid reasons for abolishing a useful, if not an absolutely needful, business? Look for a moment at such a proposition. Were not the areas of private houses, if not well kept, even more dangerous to public health than slaughter-houses? Were not private and public stables, the builder's trade, the baker's, and a score of others? In 2,181 complaints lodged by the police there are 869 against bakers, 76 against confectioners, 26 against builders, 40 against dyers, 66 against eating-house keepers, 63 against engineers and founders, 23 against fishmongers, 76 against hotel-keepers, 53 against potters, and 83 against restaurants. In the local nuisances books, for one complaint against private slaughter-houses there were a score against private and public stables. Well, what would the House do? Would the House leave untouched the stables of the sons of wealth and luxury and deal only adversely with the meat shop of the humble sort? Let such a phrase remain in the region of clap-trap, let not their acts make the phrase a reality. He knew of no source of disease so fruitful of fatal consequences as that of interfering with the food supply of the people, which precluded their obtaining fresh and wholesome meat, and drove them to tainted and deteriorated victuals. This was the Alpha and Omega of his advocacy of this cause. What was the history of the typhus fever epidemic here or elsewhere? Scarcity of wholesome meat and the resort of the humble classes to half-decomposed food. That was the secret of the "pestilence that walketh in darkness, and of the sickness that destroyeth in the noon-day." The great nitrogenizer of the blood was good fresh wholesome animal food in climates like ours. The great efficient carbonizer was defective or deteriorated food which scarcity forced on the humble classes. What was the alternative here proposed? Health, with easily cured disorder; or disease, with the tendency of slight maladies to degenerate into diphtheria and soft mortification of the palate and face. Look at the way in which those hideous ills were gaining ground on the Continent, especially the South, where for revenue far more than for sanitary motives these centralizing schemes were enforced. He would not enter here into the recent scientific investigations, nor into the proofs afforded by history, sacred and profane, of the unwisdom of our crusade against the slaughtering of beasts for human food in the cities of our Empire. He would not believe the City of London could be so ill-advised as to oppose his Bill, under the impression that thus the monopoly of the supply of the whole metropolis would be thrown into their hands. If such a whisper were credible, the sooner the hallucination were dispelled the better, for no Government would attempt so insufficient and unwise a scheme. That the attempted forcing of the dead meat market would enhance the price of meat in the country markets might, he thought, be admitted. The evidence before the Select Committee pointed that way; but let not the farmer or his friend rise at such a bait. The farmer's real interest would be found in the long run identified with that of the consumer and not with the speculator, who would pocket all the advantage of the panic he had created and fostered. The hon. Member for South Norfolk called this a retrograde policy. Well, he (Dr. Brewer) was not sure that in the face of the famine price in coals—brought on by that very irregularity of supply to which the conclusions printed at the end of the evidence of the Select Committee drew the attention of the House as the result of abolishing the live meat market, as it existed now in the metropolis—a retracing of their steps would be unwise. He was not ashamed in the face of the great contrasts of gigantic fortunes with struggling mediocracy and pinching poverty; in the face of that weight of rating, which the rejection of his Bill would inevitably greatly increase; in face of the dearness of the first necessities of life, which was causing the middle trading classes to stagger, and driving the vast body of professional men to their wits' end, to glide back from that uphill course of interfering with trade, which always ended in making supply more expensive, to the first principles of legislation, and to follow the advice of Jeremy Bentham—to let trade alone; to interfere only when the greatness of the abuse rendered it absolutely needful, and then no further than was absolutely needful. He moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Brewer.)

MR. F. S. POWELL, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that his experience as a Sanitary Commissioner and as a member of the Sanitary Committee of the Paddington Vestry, had induced him to oppose the maintenance of private slaughter-houses in London, as proposed in this Bill. He thought that the success which had attended the abolition of private slaughter-houses in Glasgow and Edinburgh was a sufficient reason why the same example should be followed in London. The valuable and exhaustive Report of Dr. Thudichum to the Medical Department of the Privy Council in 1865 might be advantageously consulted, and should induce the House greatly to restrict the number of private slaughter-houses in London, and to place them under severe regulations. The Blue Books contained much evidence to the same effect from medical witnesses, who stated that the blood and other emanations corrupted the sewers, and that these private establishments were almost always a nuisance. They rendered the inspection of meat much more difficult, and whenever diseased meat went into consumption in large quantities, the public health was prejudicially affected. The effect of the Act, which was to come into operation next year, was not to abolish private slaughter-houses altogether, but only to place them under stringent restrictions. All the large towns had special arrangements or by-laws by which these places were brought under sanitary control and constant supervision; but the metropolis had no such by-laws. The authority in London which would grant licences would be the magistrate, whereas the licensing authority ought also to be the authority that inspected. That was the recommendation of the Sanitary Commissioners. He trusted that Parliament would not abandon a Bill passed 30 years ago with due deliberation, and with ample notice to the interests concerned. What was now wanted was a public authority to construct public abattoirs in convenient localities in the metropolis, and to regulate these places. To pass the present Bill would be, however, to introduce a state of things that would be simply intolerable. The best course would be to withdraw the Bill, and submit the whole subject as res integra to a Select Committee. Although this might be said to be a vestry question, it was also a question of Imperial proportions. They lived in London, which was, in truth, a great kingdom with 3,500,000 inhabitants—a congestion of population such as had never existed on the surface of the globe. Great reforms had taken place in the sanitary condition of London. There was the Main Drainage, which was a great honour to those who designed and carried it out. There was a water supply which, considering the difficulties to be overcome, was admirable, and there were in every parish men labouring with valuable but obscure toil to mitigate the evils attendant on such vast accumulations of population. He asked the House not to take a retrograde step, as compared with the wisdom which had characterized the Legislation of that House and the action of those entrusted with power, by passing this Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Francis Powell.)

MR. LOCKE observed that by the present law, all the persons who had slaughter-houses in the metropolis would be compelled to shut up such places next year, and then the question would arise, where were we to get our supply of meat? One abattoir had been built, and that by the Corporation of the City of London, but it was no joke to build an abattoir. So expensive was this place, and so badly did it pay, that the City of London had never built another, and they had never been able to induce anyone else to build one. If it were really intended to shut up all the private slaughter-houses next year, some one ought to calculate how many abattoirs would be wanted, and what would be the expense of constructing them. But even if they were built, he doubted whether they would be of any benefit. In any case, the people who carried on this trade in private slaughter-houses said that no substitute had hitherto been provided. They had laid out their money upon this kind of property, and it was a folly to say that these establishments, which were kept clean, were more detrimental to public health than a mass of slaughter-houses jumbled up together and called an abattoir. In his opinion, London could not be sufficiently supplied from abattoirs. Why should not this Bill be read a second time and allowed to pass? It was useless to compare London with Paris on a subject of this kind. London was a meat-eating place; but what was Paris in comparison with London, and what was a Frenchman in comparison with an Englishman? The thing was absurd. With the ounces of meat that a Frenchman ate and the pounds that an Englishman ate there was no analogy between the two cities. In legislating for the metropolis they were legislating for a place which was different from every other. He had been in abattoirs and in slaughter-houses also. On the Home Circuit, he had had the honour of being one of the wine treasurers; and, in that capacity, had to look after the wine. The place they selected for their cellar at Kingston was at a butcher's, and next the slaughter-house, and he recollected very well that that cellar was perfectly free from any disagreeable smell. He had the satisfaction of seeing a calf slaughtered close to that cellar, and there was not the slightest inconvenience arising from it. The place was as clean and nice as it was possible for anybody to conceive, and this was natural, because a respectable butcher could not afford to keep his meat close to a dirty slaughter-house. The Bill simply proposed to continue the present private slaughter-houses, which caused no inconvenience, and he should support the second reading.

MR. M'COMBIE said, his hon. Friend had put the short-horn breed of cattle in a very high position. As a Scotchman and a breeder of Scotch cattle, he would beg to refer his hon. Friend to the weekly quotations in the London market, where the Scotch cattle were always placed at the top, and beg likewise to refer him to the decisions during the last six years of the Smithfield Club Show. He would find that four out of the six animals that gained the gold cup were Scotch cattle, and bred in Scotland, and not short-horns. If the private slaughter-houses were abolished, there would be a meat famine in London in hot weather, and the offal would be lost to the poorer classes. No doubt, if private slaughter-houses were a nuisance and prejudicial to health, they ought to be put down; but he could not agree in the statement that they were a nuisance. They were kept under the strict surveillance of the police, and from personal knowledge and inspection, he could say that they were most clean, and every attention was paid to their sanitary arrangement, with a constant supply of water running through them. Now, who were the parties most exposed to the influence of the slaughter-houses? It must be the butchers and their servants. Let any hon. Member visit the London cattle market on a Monday morning, and examine the bodily strength of the butchers and their servants, and they must come to the conclusion that there was no other class of tradesmen so vigorous, so strong, or so robust. So much, therefore, for the health of the men daily employed in the slaughter-houses. If they did away with the private slaughter-houses, two or three things must follow. They would drive the butchers to the dead meat market. London would be supplied with a very inferior article. He could speak as to this for the feeders in Scotland, and from his own personal experience. They would never think of sending the superior animals they forwarded at present, as their size unfitted them for the dead market. They would be under the necessity of feeding smaller and inferior cattle. In warm weather there must be a famine of beef and mutton, and the offal would be lost to the poor, which was a very serious matter. In summer dead meat could not be sent from Aberdeen, and the inhabitants of London could not be supplied with the same quantity of meat as they were at present. On the great day, at the New Cattle Market, there were about 8,000 cattle, which, valued at £30 a-head, would amount to £240,000. 16,000 sheep, at £3 a-head, about £50,000; 500 calves, at £6 a-piece, £3,000; 100 pigs, about £5 a-piece, £500—total £293,500. The average sold at the New Cattle Market was about 4,000 bullocks, which, valued at £23, would amount to £92,000; 25,000 sheep, at about 50s., £62,000 to £70,000; 500 calves, at £6, £3,000; 100 pigs, at £5, £500—total £157,500.

Mr. CLARE READ believed that if they abolished every private slaughter-house in the metropolis there would be no more difference than now existed between the wholesale and retail price of meat, and if inspectors came to them in the country, and abolished pig-styes when near cottages, he thought the time had come when cow-houses and slaughter-houses should be done away with in the metropolis. Although it had been predicted otherwise, he was quite convinced that the removal of the cattle market from Smithfield to Islington had nothing to do with the present high price of meat. They had been told by the hon. Member who moved the second reading of this Bill that if they abolished the slaughter-houses in the metropolis it would be impossible to control and to regulate the supplies of meat from the country. He apprehended that there would be several large public slaughter-houses in London, one at Islington Market and others in convenient places. How was the fish market regulated? Was it not by telegraph? And of course it would be easier to get beasts from the country than to get fish from the sea, and yet London was always well supplied with fish. He was surprised at his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen supporting the measure, and he contended that there would be no difficulty, as had been stated, in conveying the offal from the public slaughterhouses to the districts where it was consumed by the poor. He believed it was desirable, both for the health of the community, humanity to the cattle, and the supply of good meat, that the trade in dead meat should be developed as much as possible, and as these private slaughter-houses tended to restrict it, he should offer it his opposition.

Mr. BRUCE said, the very tenderness which had been shown in the Act of 1844 in dealing with vested interests had been used as an argument against putting it into force. Divesting the subject, however, of all exaggeration, it was certain that the Act would not necessarily destroy all the private slaughter-houses; for while it left untouched such places as were 40 feet from the public road and 50 feet from any inhabited house, a discretion was left in the hands of the magistrates, who could remit the penalty where it was clearly shown that the existence of any particular slaughter-house was not injurious to the community. It was perfectly true that the Select Committee reported these houses as a rule as not unhealthy, but they also reported that their tendency was to attract trades such as tripe-boiling and tallow-chandling, which were injurious to health, and the Committee consequently recommended that private slaughter-houses should be got rid of and that they should be replaced by public establishments. This being so, the question was whether it would be wise, as the notice which had been given destroyed any claim for compensation on the part of vested interests, to throw away the chance of dealing with the question in the manner which would be most conducive to the public interest. The experience of Glasgow and other large towns where the system of public slaughter-houses had been adopted was to show that these establishments were carried on more economically than private slaughter-houses; that the animals were more cheaply killed, and that the result was to diminish, rather than to increase, the price of meat; and he did not see why the same might not be the case in the metropolis, because a great portion of the trade was carried on by men who never slaughtered at all and who would therefore be able to procure their supply just as well from a public as from a private slaughter-house. He was not prepared therefore under these circumstances to assent to the second reading of the Bill and to forego the advantages which they might fairly expect from the Act of 1844. Still, the subject of our meat supply was too important to be dealt with hastily, and if the hon. Member would withdraw his Bill and propose the appointment of a Select Committee, he would promise the support of the Government to that proposal.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, that if he understood the right hon. Gentleman to state that the Government, after the inquiry, would take the initiative in the matter, he should advise his hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Dr. Brewer) to withdraw the Bill. This was not the first time he was impressed with the conviction that it was bad for Parliament to attempt to legislate through a telescope. It was most absurd to talk of the making of laws 20 or 30 years in advance. In his opinion, Parliament could never have intended these private slaughter-houses to be done away with without any public establishments having been provided in their stead; and therefore, as the Government had not taken any step towards making such a provision in this respect, the Bill had been introduced. He thought there could be no difficulty in the matter; and if the right hon. Gentleman would at once appoint the Committee, and would give them a pledge that before the end of the Session, or at all events before the penal law came into operation, he would introduce an official Bill on the subject, the measure now before the House need not be further proceeded with.

MR. BRUCE said, that if the proposed inquiry should lead to the conclusion that public slaughter-houses ought to be erected, it would be necessary to give the local authorities power to erect them, and it would be the duty of the Government to introduce a measure to confer such powers.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the only matter that could properly be referred to a Committee was the question how best to carry out the principle of the Act of 1844, which distinctly gave notice that private slaughter-houses should cease in the metropolis, and he considered that the inquiry should be strictly limited to that subject. The Committee should not attempt to reopen the great question of public versus private slaughter-houses; but an inquiry should be made into the means by which during the next 12 months, provision might be made for the establishment of public slaughter-houses, and he thought that such an inquiry must be undertaken by the Government itself. He believed that if a system of public slaughter-houses were substituted for private ones the former would derive enormous advantage from being taken out of the restrictions of the Act, so that this nuisance would remain more unchecked than before.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he hoped the hon. Member for Colchester (Dr. Brewer) would assent to the proposal for a Committee, and that the result of subsequent legislation would prove beneficial to the inhabitants of the metropolis, whose interests, he reminded the House, were far more important than those of the particular classes involved. He trusted that the inquiry would not be limited in any respect, because at present there was a difference of opinion as to whether private slaughter-houses could, or could not be continued under the Act, some people affirming that they could, and others that they could not. It was highly desirable that the investigation should be followed by speedy legislation, which should be based upon the experience of the past 30 years.

DR. BREWER expressed his readiness to withdraw the Bill on the understanding that the Committee might inquire into the whole subject.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT said, he trusted that whatever arrangement was ultimately arrived at, the slaughtering of cattle would be so carried on as to inflict the least possible pain on the animals to be killed. For this purpose, efficient inspection of slaughter-houses, public or private, should be provided. He thought that a strong argument in favour of abattoirs was that they afforded ample means of inspection on the part of the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which were not given by any other system.

UNIVERSITY TESTS (DUBLIN) (No. 3) BILL.—RESOLUTION.

MR. FAWCETT moved to resolve—

"That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the abolition of Tests in Trinity College and the University of Dublin."

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: I rise to Order, Sir. I beg to call your attention to the hour (it was now 14 minutes to Six of the clock.)

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that I do now leave the Chair.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: I now, Sir, beg to call your attention to the hour. This is an opposed Motion, and it is past a quarter to 6 o'clock.

MR. SPEAKER: This being an opposed Motion there is no doubt that, according to the Orders of the House, the debate must stand adjourned till to-morrow.

And it being after a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

IMPROVEMENT OF LAND.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY rose to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the facilities afforded by the existing law for the investment of capital in the improvement of land, and to report whether any alteration of the law is requisite in order further to encourage such investment. He did not think that in making this Motion it would be necessary for him to attempt to justify it at any length; but he wished to place before their Lordships a few figures in justification of the statement he made last year in moving the second reading of his Bill (the Limited Owners Improvements Bill) when he pointed out the serious difficulties under which in the present state of the law the limited owner was placed when he desired to lay out his money in the improvement of his own land, and he at the same time suggested that the fact of only a comparatively small use having been made of the provisions of the Act of 1864 was due possibly to the conditions which the Act required and to the constant tutelage in which the landowner availing himself of it was kept by the Inclosure Commissioners, to whom the working of the Act was entrusted. Since last year Returns had been issued of the monies lent under that Act, and also under what were called the Companies' Acts—Acts which empowered Companies to override the ordinary law of settlement and entail in order to obtain security for money they might advance to the owners of estates for improvements. These Acts gave such greater facilities to landowners desirous of borrowing, that large amounts of money had been advanced under them; while the Act of 1864, which only enabled limited owners to invest their own money in the improvement of their estates, had operated to only a very limited extent. He found from the Returns to which he alluded that under the Companies' Acts the amount spent in farm buildings was £1,833,000; while for the same purpose the amount spent under the Act of 1864 was £71,000. Under the Companies' Acts the amount spent on labourers' cottages was £336,000, and the sum spent for the same object under the Act of 1864 was only £8,000. He could not believe that landowners spontaneously preferred paying interest to Companies—which must include profit on their capital and the cost of their staff—rather than employ their own money in the improvement of their own estates. He could not but think that there was something in the mode of working the Act of 1864 which accounted for the facts shown by the Returns, and that was the chief ground on which he introduced his Bill of last year. When it became evident that he could not hope to carry the Bill through Parliament that Session, he intimated his intention of re-introducing it this year, and to get it read the second time as early as possible, in order that it might be referred to a Select Committee, who would inquire into the whole subject. The terms of the reference he now proposed were large enough to enable the Committee—and he hoped they would undertake the task—to go into a somewhat wider inquiry. An idea was spread abroad that settlement and entail were arrangements adverse to the improvement of land. He believed the fact to be exactly the reverse. He believed that the greatest bane under which any agricultural system could exist was a state of heavy mortgages—especially when the money had been raised, not for the improvement of the land, but for extravagance. While the system of entail might, to some extent, and in an indirect manner—and only in an indirect manner—hinder the sale of land, it was an actual bar to extravagant mortgages. But as ideas to the contrary had been so industriously spread abroad, he thought that a Committee of their Lordships' House could do no better than inquire into the matter and elicit the opinions of those practically acquainted with it. This, however, was only a subsidiary object of the Committee. The main object was that which he ventured to bring under the notice of their Lordships last year—namely, to give to limited owners proper facilities for investing their own money in the improvement of their own land.

Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the facilities afforded by the existing law to limited owners of land for the investment of capital in the improvement of such land, and to report whether any alteration of the law is requisite in order further to encourage such investment.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD REDESDALE said, that no one was more anxious than he that facilities should be given to landed proprietors to improve their own land. He must remind their Lordships that when landowners borrowed money under the Companies' Acts they put themselves under the control of those Acts. There could be no objection to allowing a limited owner to spend his own money in the improvement of his estate, and to charge that money on the estate if he did so under proper safeguards—and if they placed themselves under the same rules as were laid down by the Companies' Acts, they would have no greater difficulties. But the Bill introduced by the noble Marquess last year would have relieved the landowners of all responsibility as to the way in which the money was laid out. Now, anyone who borrowed money under the Companies' Act was obliged to declare the object for which he desired to borrow, to lay it out under inspection, and to make such yearly payments as would extinguish the whole debt in 25 years. There could be no objection to the Inquiry into this subject which the noble Marquess now proposed; but as to the second head of inquiry he did not think much good would arise from it, because, as the prejudices of their Lordships' House were supposed to be in favour of the existing law of settlement and entail, he did not think the Report of their Committee would have much weight out-of-doors. He did hope that there would be no inquiry by the Select Committee into the relations between landlord and tenant. He trusted nothing of that kind would ever be thought of. There was at present an excellent feeling between landlord and tenant in this country; and nothing should be done to bring the law in between them.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that though from the remarks of the noble Marquess it would appear that the scope of the Inquiry would be larger than was expressed by the Notice, he had no objection to offer to the Motion.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he was in favour of an Inquiry by a Committee. He would express no opinion on the subject of what his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) called the "subsidiary object" of the Inquiry; but as regarded the Inquiry respecting the state of the law in relation to the investment of capital in land, he thought it might prove useful. Certainly there could be no objection to allow limited owners to lay out their own monies in the improvement of their estates with greater facility if the risks to the estate from loss arising from such investments were not at the same time increased. He thought that the noble Marquess's observations in respect to the law of settlement and entail were very extraordinary and very wide of the main subject. No doubt opinions were freely entertained abroad on those subjects; but he did not see how they could be brought within the scope of the Inquiry of a Committee appointed to inquire into the investment of a man's own money in his own estate. If that proposition were omitted, there could be no reasonable objection to the Motion.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, that from the terms of the Notice he had apprehended that the Inquiry contemplated by the noble Marquess would be of a restricted character, that it would have reference only to the investment of his own money by a limited proprietor in the improvement of land. From the noble Marquess's speech he was, however happy to learn that the Inquiry would have a wider scope. The solicitude of the noble Marquess was aroused for the limited proprietors who had money to invest. There was another and a larger class who deserved the interest of the noble Marquess in a greater degree—the class of limited proprietors who had no money, but who were anxious to improve their land and to obtain money on fair terms for that purpose. It was unnecessary to enforce the great importance of increasing the productive powers of the soil. That object could be attained in two ways—by improving the cultivation of the land already under tillage, and by increasing the area of cultivation. In regard to the first, it had been affirmed by competent authority, ratified by the opinion of a noble Earl opposite, whose judgment was deserving of the greatest respect, that the produce of land now under cultivation might be doubled by the highest application of capital and skill. It was more difficult to say what result could be attained by the reclamation of lands now lying waste. We had no accurate knowledge of the amount of waste which could be brought under cultivation with profit, but no doubt the area was considerable. In the agricultural returns there were more than 24,000,000 of acres which were not brought under any head of crop or produce in England and Scotland. Of course that land was not all lying waste, nor was it all susceptible of profitable improvement. Much was mountain pasture of an excellent quality, very profitable in its present form. Much, on the other hand, was moor and bog, lying at a high elevation, which no amount of expenditure would render productive; but it was equally certain that a large extent existed which was not profitable in its present condition, and which might be rendered remunerative by a judicious outlay. A considerable area was indeed unprofitably appropriated to the purposes of sport. In Ireland 4,250,000 acres returned as absolutely waste—not used for the purposes of pasture in any shape. He contended that the proprietors of land under settlement were subjected to conditions which greatly limited their powers in prosecuting agricultural improvement so necessary to the welfare of the whole community. They could only borrow money from the Companies at rates, including interest and sinking fund, amounting to between 6 and 7 per cent. Proprietors of entailed estates ought, in his opinion, to have the power of borrowing at the market rate of 4 per cent for substantial improvements, and of making the outlay a permanent charge on the estate. It was true that the substantial improvement might not be an everlasting one. The improvement might in the course of years be absorbed or worn-out, but it would last two generations; it would last as long as the settlement under which it was effected, and that was all that the law need require, for though the proprietor of an entailed estate was bound to transmit the estate unimpaired in value to his immediate successors, he was not bound to transmit it with an increased value for ever. If the poorer order of limited proprietors were enabled to obtain the means of effecting improvements on terms such as he had indicated, he believed that an immense development in the productive power of the land would shortly be attained. While the poorer order of limited proprietors lay under grievous disabilities with reference to the amelioration of the land, their situation was still worse in regard to the improvement of the habitations of the labourers. To reclaim the land was difficult, but to rebuild the cottages was impossible. For the latter purpose money could only be got at 7 per cent. That rate was almost prohibitive, for cottage building was in many cases absolutely unremunerative; indeed, the new cottage was sometimes rather an additional charge than a source of profit to the estate. Nor could money be obtained for every class of cottages. The Commissioners would only sanction loans for cottages directly necessary to the farm on which they were situated, but it was obvious that it might be desirable to reconstruct many cottages generally necessary for the welfare and convenience of the property and the neighbourhood which were not strictly requisite for the farm in which they were placed. It must also be remarked that the Commissioners, even in cases in which sanction was granted, impeded the course of improvement by insisting on plans and specifications far beyond the local standard of comfort and convenience. The cottages erected in Scotland, under the sanction of the Commissioners, cost on an average £140 a-piece, when £80 or £90 would provide a habitation commensurate to the wants and resources of the agricultural labourer. While such were the discouragements and impediments to the reconstruction of rural habitations, the necessity for this work was most pressing. In Scotland one-third of the agricultural population, according to the last Census, were lodged in tenements comprising only one room, while another third inhabited houses composed of two rooms. In Ireland there were more than 80,000 habitations of one room. In England statistical information was wanting, but the agricultural Reports disclosed a lamentable want of good accommodation for the rural classes. With a view to the performance of a sacred duty and the remedy of a deplorable evil, he claimed for the limited land owner the power of borrowing at the current market rate, for the reconstruction of agricultural labourers' dwellings and the power of making a permanent charge on the estate for that purpose. He could not allege that the improvement would always be a profitable one to the estate in a pecuniary sense, but it was essential to the honour of the proprietor and the welfare of the people. We had fallen on times when duties of a social and sanitary character could no longer be neglected with impunity. The country was strictly investigated by sanitary officers, by whom every neglect and abuse would be dragged to light, and by whom proprietors who did not conform to the requisitions of the age would be held up to public reprobation, though their failure might be far more owing to want of means than to want of good will. If the noble Marquess would include all these matters in his inquiry, if his object was to promote by every possible means, the investment of capital in the improvement of land and the reconstruction of dwellings, and to afford these facilities to the poor and burdened owner, as well as to the more favoured members of the same order, then, indeed, his Inquiry might issue in great and lasting benefits to the community, and it would have his (Lord Napier's) most unqualified and cordial support.

EARL GREY said, he could not agree with the noble Lord who had just sat down that there were grievous impediments in the way of the limited owner of an estate borrowing money for improvements. He must say he had never heard of money being borrowed for the purposes referred to at so high an interest as 7 per cent. He had known large sums borrowed on conditions involving annual payments of £6 12s. or £6 14s. per cent for improvement of land; but those sums included not only the ordinary interest for the money but the sinking fund for the extinguishment of the debt in 25 years. The noble Lord, if he understood him correctly, wished to diminish the annual charge by relieving those who borrowed for improvements from the necessity of providing a sinking fund to pay off the debt. He trusted this would not be allowed. He hoped Parliament would never permit a limited owner to borrow money and charge it on the estate without obliging him to contribute a sinking fund. No proprietor should be permitted to burden with a permanent debt an estate in which he had only a life interest. It seemed to him that nothing could be more injudicious than to do anything calculated to burden the land with permanent charges. There was no greater evil to a country than that a large portion of its land should be held subject to mortgages. Neither could he concur with the noble Lord that a limited owner should be permitted to borrow what sums he liked in open market, and subject to no conditions such as those imposed on those who borrowed under the Public Companies' Acts. To prevent gross abuses it was absolutely necessary to provide some means of ensuring that money professedly borrowed for improvements should really be so applied. And he denied that there was any evidence that the existing system failed in affording great facilities for improvement. He thought, on the contrary, that everyone who had carefully watched what was going on in the country would concur with him that since the repeal of the Corn Laws the march of agricultural improvement had been more rapid than could have been anticipated. The change in the character of the farm buildings and cottages and the improved skill in the cultivation of the soil were, to his mind, very remarkable considering how little the science of agriculture was understood until within a comparatively recent time, and how much ignorance was still to be found both among owners and occupiers of land. The noble Lord said that it was specially necessary to make some change with reference to the improvement of cottages. No man felt more strongly than he (Earl Grey) did the urgent necessity that there was for improving the dwellings of the poor, not only in the country, but still more in the towns—because if there was a grievance in this respect in the country, he was persuaded that that grievance was infinitely greater in the towns. In the country they did not find four or five families crammed into a single room, as they found in the great cities. The improvement that had taken place within the last few years in the habits of the population in the country, and in their houses generally, was something that was very remarkable indeed. Such an improvement, however, could only proceed by degrees, and in the agricultural districts the progress was considerable—but a great and general change could not be effected in a day. But when the noble Lord said that the great want of better cottages would justify Parliament in enabling the owners of land to put a permanent charge upon it for improvements which he admitted would not be remunerative—so that the work would be done partly at the charge of their successors—it appeared to him (Earl Grey) that this would be simply to enable the present generation to be generous and charitable, not at their own expense, but at the expense of others. He thought this could not in justice be allowed, though he admitted there was a great difficulty about building cottages, because the rents working men could give would not in general pay a fair interest on their cost. But proprietors in some parts of the country at least found that it was absolutely necessary in their own interests to have good cottages, quite irrespective of their being directly remunerative. In Northumberland—and he believed it was pretty much the same in Scotland—the custom was to have a certain number of cottages attached to every farm, and it answered to spend money in improving these cottages, because from experience it was found that they could not get good farm servants without having good cottages for them. This accounted for the marvellous improvements that had taken place in agricultural dwellings in the county of Northumberland within his recollection. He remembered the time when almost universally each cottage in that part of the country had only a single room, and in some few cases he had even seen a part of this one room cut off with wicker-work for the cow. The old Northumbrian cottages were kept very clean, all things considered; but still they were very wretched habitations. They had, however, been fast disappearing, and very few were to be found now. Even the small minority of the owners of land who were not willing to make improvements in the cottages on their estates were driven into doing so by the fact that good farm servants could not be got without good cottages being provided for them. But it was not because there ought to be better cottages that they should depart from all sound principles, and enable landlords to charge their estates in perpetuity for the purpose of effecting these improvements. Almost the only point upon which he concurred with the noble Lord who had just spoken was that he thought that there was reason to doubt whether the Commissioners had not been somewhat too strict in their requirements as to the accommodation to be provided in cottages built under their authority; because practically the question was this—whether you would be content with cottages falling somewhat short of what you would wish to have, or go on with the miserable ones you found standing—because if you insisted on too costly a cottage as a condition for charging the expense on the land, none at all would be built. It was a mistake also to attempt too violent a change in the habits of the people. He was therefore of opinion that till lately the Commissioners had been too severe in reference to the cottages which they had required to be built. But within the last two or three years this mistake had been to a great degree corrected. The inquiry into the condition of the agricultural population in Northumberland had been very ably conducted by Mr. Henley, the Assistant Commissioner, and in consequence of his Report there had of late been a very considerable relaxation in the requirements of the Commissioners with respect to cottages. As to the figures which the noble Lord (Lord Napier) quoted in reference to the large amount of land that was capable of cultivation, but which was left useless or only partially cultivated, he confessed that he always listened to these statistics with the very greatest possible suspicion. When you demanded details you had great difficulty in finding where this improveable land was. According to his experience, wherever it was practicable to improve land, there was now a very great desire to improve it. Then they must remember that a great outcry had been raised of late as to the enclosing and dividing of commons; but unless they did this, then in reference to common land in many cases the improvement of land was practically impossible. Further, he did not see how they could interfere in reference to the land which was kept for the purposes of sport, unless they were prepared to interfere also with the merchants and other persons of wealth who took agricultural land, and turned it into pleasure grounds and gardens. All these things were consequent upon the increase of wealth, and could hardly be interfered with—especially as we now opened our ports to the introduction of food from all parts of the world. As to the Motion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), it seemed that one of his main motives for bringing forward this Motion was that he believed that persons having money of their own had not the same facilities for investing it in the improvement of their estates as those enjoyed by owners who not having money of their own to invest, borrowed money for that object. If this were really the case such a state of things ought to be altered; but he could not help thinking that the small sum spent by the former class of owners in improving land under the Act of 1864, as compared with that spent by the latter in the same kind of improvement carried on under the Companies' Acts, arose from another cause than that to which the noble Marquess attributed it. He believed the real reason was that the number of owners who had money of their own to lay out was small as compared with the number of those who had not. But, be that as it might, the subject was one which might usefully engage the attention of a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, that as far as his experience went he had found no difficulty whatever in borrowing money for the improvement of an entailed estate, or in spending his own money for the same purpose, when he had any to spare. All you had to do was to go to the Improvement Commissioners if you had money of your own, and when they had made inquiry the thing was settled. On the other hand, if you wanted to borrow money, you got it through a Land Improvement Company, though the land could not be burdened for more than 25 years.

LORD CAIRNS feared that if the order of reference were made in its present form the Committee might think that the scope of its Inquiry was much wider than his noble Friend really intended it to be. He would suggest that his noble Friend's object would be answered if the Committee were appointed "to inquire into the facilities afforded by the existing law to limited owners of land for the investment of capital in the improvement of such land."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he would accept the alteration suggested. The debate had shown that, under the reference as it stood, some questions might possibly arise as to the relations between landlord and tenant, and there were various reasons why this House should undertake no such inquiry. He was not going to reply to the speech of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Napier), which had, indeed, been admirably answered already by the noble Earl on the cross-benches. He would, however, just mention one instance as to the value of the statistics which had been published by the Government, which made him doubt if their figures were entirely trustworthy. If they looked to the Returns that came from Belgium they would find that the extent of cultivated land stated to be in Belgium was greater than the whole extent of land that there was in Belgium; and he did not think that this was likely to be the case.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the facilities afforded by the existing law to limited owners of land for the investment of capital in the improvement of such land, and to report whether any alteration of the law is requisite in order further to encourage such investment.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

RAILWAYS AND TELEGRAPHS IN PERSIA.—QUESTION.

LORD STRATHNAIRN asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they have received any information that the Shah or Government of Persia has given a contract to Baron de Reuter for the construction of all railroads, lines of electric telegraph, and canals in Persia; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information that the Government of Russia intend or entertain the project of making a railroad from some part of Russia to Kurrachee, or in the direction of the frontier of India, or of any part of the Persian Gulf? As regarded the first Question, he had received information which made it perfectly clear that the contract in question had been given by the Shah of Persia to Baron de Reuter. Now, railways and telegraphs were important means both of commercial and military operations; and he trusted the Government would be able to assure their Lordships that the Persian railway system, and the line, if any, projected from Russia toward the Indian frontier or some part of the Persian Gulf, would be carried out really for the interests of Persia, and in the interests also of peace and in accordance with the policy of this country.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that early last autumn he was informed by Baron de Reuter, first privately and then officially, that a concession had been made to him of the railway in question. With regard to the second part of the Question, he had made inquiry on the subject, but had received no official communication, and no private information of any value, that there was such a scheme.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to the Pollution of Rivers—Was presented by The Earl of SHAFTESBURY; read 1st. (No. 59.)

they received in the hospital and made other arrangements in their favour, and also in favour of the out-pensioners. In 1869 further advantages were given both to the out-pensioners and to those who had been in the Hospital. It was, therefore, not correct to say that no advantages were given to the out-pensioners. The pensioners who had been in the Hospital had certainly been selected on grounds of merit or length of service, and there was no intention of making any alteration in favour of the out-pensioners.

NAVY—CONTRACT PRICES.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will grant a Return showing what is the contract or cost price of the following articles for the current year, viz., Beef, Pork, Bread, Rum, Tea, Sugar, Flour, and Suet?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that he could not give the information for the financial year which had just commenced, but he had no objection to do so for the year which had passed.

NAVY—GREENWICH PENSIONERS. QUESTION.

MR. STONE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the case that those Greenwich Pensioners who were inmates of the Hospital prior to 1865 received, on leaving the Hospital, pensions much larger than, and in some cases as much as double, those which they enjoyed before they entered, while the Pensioners who never entered the hospital received no corresponding advantage; whether the former class of Pensioners had any superior claims, either on the ground of merit or length of service; and, whether, in order to diminish the present inequality between the two classes, he can grant to those who have never been in the hospital either an increase of pension, or a reduction of the standard of age at which an increased pension is now enjoyed?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that those Greenwich pensioners who were in the Hospital prior to 1865 received, on leaving, some compensation in addition to the pension which they were previously in the receipt of. The Act of 1865 gave them the money allowance

COMPULSORY EDUCATION—PRISONS ACT, 1865.—QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there is anything to prevent education being made compulsory in prisons; and, should there be no obstacle, whether he will take measures as soon as possible to make education compulsory in all prisons throughout the United Kingdom?

MR. BRUCE in reply, said, that under the Prisons Act of 1865 the Visiting Justices were required to make provision in every prison for the instruction of illiterate prisoners in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and that part of the Act had been fairly well complied with. All prisoners who could not read and write were instructed in reading and writing, and those who could, in most cases, received other instruction. He had communicated with the Inspectors of Prisons, and although there were cases in which which larger provision for instruction might with advantage be made by the Visiting Justices, still he was satisfied it was unnecessary to make any change in the existing law.

BURIALS.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the evidence given at an inquest held on the 24th ultimo at Bethnal Green, to the effect that the dead bodies of five persons (a woman and four children) were placed for burial in a single coffin by William Burridge, an undertaker carrying on business in Bethnal Green, Walworth, and other places, contractor for burials from Millbank Prison, and Hackney and Bethnal Green Workhouses, and to the admission of the said William Burridge that, though paid for burying dead bodies separately, he sometimes "buried three or four together;" and, whether the Right honourable Gentleman is prepared, considering the facilities afforded by this system for concealing child murder, to take any steps to suppress it?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that some time ago he directed the Inspector of Burials to attend the inquest now proceeding, and that gentleman had done so, the inquiry having been adjourned from time to time. He had also ordered that a full Report should be presented, not only on this particular case, but on the general subject. The Inspector had not yet made his Report, and he wished to postpone giving a full answer until he should have received it. In the meantime he was informed that the Bill of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) would to a considerable extent provide for such cases.

FRANCE—THE COMMERCIAL TREATY, 1860.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES (for Mr. R. N. FOWLER) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, when the Government agreed to continue the Cobden Treaty, any efforts were made to induce the French Government to suspend the "surtaxe" on the British flag, and the "droits d'entrepôt" levied on goods and produce transhipped from England to France; and, why the conventional tariffs were allowed to remain in force while a prohibitory tax on British ships was to be enforced, and the "droits d'entrepôt" were to be levied on goods not landed in England, but sent "in transitu" to France, as was permitted under the Cobden Treaty?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: As soon, Sir, as Her Majesty's Government found that the state of business in the French Assembly would not allow of the Treaty of Commerce being discussed as speedily as was anticipated, they instructed Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris to represent to the French Government the injury to British shipping and commerce sustained by the continuance of the surtaxe de pavillon, from which the Treaty signed on the 5th of November last would have exempted British vessels had it come into operation as soon as had been contemplated. Her Majesty's Government have again recently called the attention of the French Government to this subject. The surtaxe d'entrepôt is not a differential duty, being levied on French and foreign vessels alike, the only articles exempted from it under the Treaty of 1860 are jute, cotton, and wool. The regulations under which this surtax was imposed, and still continues to be levied, are contained in the Commercial Papers laid before Parliament last year (No. 1, page 153). I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the continuance of the Conventional Tariff was not a concession on the part of this country, for the tariff under the Treaty of 1860 expired on the 15th of March; and had that tariff not been continued, the commercial relations between the two countries, pending the ratification of the new Treaty, would have been thrown into much confusion.

ARMY—YEOMANRY ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN HOOD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to the increased duties and restrictions regarding leave of Adjutants of Yeomanry, entirely changing the conditions under which they accepted their appointments, he will consider of granting them such fair and moderate pension as may induce them to retire and make way for officers who may be disposed to accept the appointment under its present altered conditions of service, which impose on Adjutants of Yeomanry the same regulations that affect Adjutants of the other Auxiliary Forces, without according to them the same rate of pay and allowances?

MR. CARDWELL in reply, said, that the officers appointed to the command of Cavalry districts would Report upon the pay and duties of Adjutants of Yeomanry, and when the reports were received it would be considered whether any changes were expedient.

THE TREASURY AND THE POST-OFFICE—ALLEGED MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS.—QUESTION.

MR. NORWOOD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Treasury have appointed a Committee to inquire into the proceedings of the Treasury and the Post Office, as suggested by the Committee of Public Accounts; and, if so, whether he will give the names and the position of the gentlemen who are to serve on the Committee?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Treasury, Sir, have not appointed a Committee in the meaning of a body of independent judicial authority. What they have done is this. In compliance with the wishes of the Committee of Public Accounts they have commenced an inquiry into the circumstances in question. That inquiry is conducted by the agency of gentlemen in the Treasury Department, and when the facts are all collected it will be for my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury and myself, who are responsible to Parliament, to take such steps as our sense of duty may dictate. To mention the names of the persons employed in the inquiry would be quite contrary to official rule, and would be to expose them to responsibilities to which they ought not to be subjected. We, the heads of the Department, are responsible for what shall be done.

SHERIFFS SUBSTITUTE (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the unanimous opinion of the Law Courts (Scotland) Commission, in their Report of the 12th July 1870, that the remuneration of the Sheriffs Substitute of Scotland is inadequate to their position; and, whether the Government are prepared, without further delay, to give effect to the Recommendation of the Commission that these salaries should be increased?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Government had had their attention directed to the Law Courts Commissioners Report, to which the hon. Baronet alluded. The Commissioners recommended that in some instances the salaries should be increased, and in others should be diminished. The Government had increased some of the salaries, although not exactly in the proportion recommended by the Commission, and they had made no reductions in any instances. They were unable to undertake that they should treat the matter in any other manner than they had already done, and that was not as a whole, but by inquiry into each particular case.

NAVY—GOOD-SERVICE PENSIONS.

QUESTION.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is to be understood that Officers of all ranks who have been or who shall be awarded good service pensions subsequently to the Regulations of 1872 are to be entitled to receive such pensions while on full pay, as was the case previous to 1870; and, if so, whether he will take into consideration the cases of those to whom good service pensions were awarded between 1870 and 1872, so as to place them on an equal footing with their more fortunate brother-officers?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, his hon. and gallant Friend did not understand him correctly if he understood that the Regulations applied to officers of all ranks. The Order in Council of 1872 applied to captains only. He would ask his hon. and gallant Friend to distinguish between the case of flag officers and captains. As regarded flag officers they were precisely in the position they were left in by the Order in Council of 1871. The number of their good service pensions had not been reduced, nor had the tenure of them been altered. He should add that the Treasury were not at all interested in the suspension of the good service pensions in the case of flag officers when on full pay. In the case of captains the tenure was changed, and they were allowed by the Order in Council of 1872 to hold their pensions on full pay; but that rule was not intended to come into force until there had been a certain reduction in numbers. However, he was prepared to make a considerable change, and to allow the benefit to come into operation from the 1st April this year.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1872—POOR LAW INSPECTORS.—QUESTION.

DR. LUSH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether identical instructions were given to the Poor Law Inspectors appointed by him to interpret the provisions of "The Public Health Act, 1872," to the various urban and sanitary authorities, and if he can state to the House whether the advice given by the Poor Law Inspectors was alike in all cases when the scheme of conjoint appointment of Medical Officers of Health was under discussion; and, whether in cases where Medical Officers of Health have been appointed over large areas, it is the intention of the Local Government Board to utilise the local knowledge of Poor Law Medical Officers for sanitary purposes, by reports (or otherwise) to the Medical Officer of Health; and, if so, in what way they are to be remunerated for the extra services thus rendered?

Mr. STANSFELD, in reply, said, that in every case identical instructions were given to the Poor Law Inspectors who conferred with and advised the Local Authorities with reference to provisions of the Public Health Act, 1872, when the scheme of conjoint appointment of Medical Officers of Health was under discussion. The advice given, of course, was not in all cases identical, because it had to be given, on the one hand, with reference to the general question, and on the other, to the special circumstances of each locality. With reference to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman, in the case of the appointment of Medical Officers of Health over large areas, sooner or later it would be necessary that localities and authorities, should also avail themselves of the special knowledge of the Poor Law Medical Officers. In what way they would be remunerated for that special knowledge he was not prepared to say, but undoubtedly they would be entitled to some special remuneration.

THE DOG LICENCE.—QUESTION.

Mr. RIDLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to a Petition presented from a large number of Owners and Occupiers of Land in Northumberland, praying for alterations in the existing Law respecting the keeping of Dogs, and, in particular, pointing to the desirability of substituting discriminating Duties or Licences for the present uniform one; and, whether he will consider the propriety of carrying into effect any of the suggestions there made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not, Sir, think it desirable that I should answer any Questions relative to alterations in the Revenue Laws before the time which has been fixed for bringing forward the Financial statement of the year.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

Mr. MCCARTHY DOWNING asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether a Committee, composed of the Marquess of Lansdowne, Mr. Herbert Murray, and Captain Crossman, did not, early in the year 1871, inquire into the organisation and working of the Board of Works in Ireland, with a view to its improvement; whether the Committee did not report to the Treasury; whether that Report was not sent to the Board of Works for their observations and suggestions; whether that Board returned the said Report to the Treasury; and, if so, why has it not been laid upon the Table of the House; if not, why; and, under all the circumstances, is it the intention of the Treasury to present the Report; and, if so, when?

Mr. BAXTER: Sir, the Marquess of Lansdowne and the other two gentlemen named by the hon. Member inquired into the Board of Works in 1871, and reported to the Treasury in February, 1872. The Report covered a very wide field. It was referred to the Board of Works on its receipt for the observations of the Commissioners, and these were received in May last. There were differences of opinion between the Committee of Inquiry and the Chairman of the Board upon many points, which required subsequent conferences and communications to explain. The Treasury has now come to a decision upon the subject, which is on the eve of being communicated to the Board of Works; but there never was any intention, nor would it be usual to present to Parliament the Report of a Departmental Committee of Inquiry upon a matter strictly within the province of the Treasury's ordinary administration. There will, however, be no objection to present a Copy of their Minute before the Vote for this establishment is taken.

CIVIL SERVICE (IRELAND)—REPORTS OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

Mr. MCCARTHY DOWNING asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, at an early day after the Easter Recess, Copies of the three Reports made to the Government by the Commissioners appointed last year to inquire into the cases of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, the Royal Irish Constabulary, and certain other branches of the Civil Service in Ireland?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Reports, Sir, of the Commission to which the hon. Gentleman refers were made to the Treasury and not to the Irish Government. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has already answered several Questions respecting them, and I do not know that I have anything to add to what my right hon. Friend has stated; but I would point out to my hon. Friend that these Reports deal with questions of great importance and very considerable difficulty, which not only affect the interests reported on, but also raise questions as to the sources from which additional expenditure may be drawn. It will, I think, be desirable that time should be allowed for their consideration by the Government before these Reports are laid upon the Table.

SUGAR DUTIES—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE, 1864.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to his reply—

"That Her Majesty's Government had received no communication from the French Government on the subject of the application of chemical analysis to the assessment of the Sugar Duty."

Whether, the representatives of the Conference having

"undertaken to invite their respective Governments to study the question under this aspect, through competent men, and to communicate between them and the 1st January 1873 the results of these studies," and the Governments of Holland, Belgium, and Great Britain having complied with this invitation, Her Majesty's Government will inquire of the French Government whether it has accepted or declined the invitation; and, whether Her Majesty's Government is aware that, while this question is still pending between the four Powers who are parties to the Convention of 1864, the French Government is proposing to pass a Law containing a provision for the application of chemical analysis to the assessment of the Sugar Duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the French Government have undertaken the inquiry alluded to in the first Question, and it is very near completion. As to the second Question, a Bill has been introduced into the French Assembly for the purpose mentioned; it is a Bill to which we see no sort of objection.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF ANN MURRAY.—QUESTION.

MR. W. LOWTHER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the statement, as given in "the Times" of 2nd April is correct, that the Police Magistrate at Marlborough Street, "on hearing the answer of Ann Murray (accused of stealing the Earl of Granville's towels) decided him to discharge the prisoner, although he was satisfied she was a thief?"

MR. BRUCE: I am glad to find that the hon. Gentleman opposite takes an interest in the property of my noble Colleague. I believe, Sir, the facts of the case are these:—The woman was charged with stealing a napkin, which was the property of my noble Friend, Earl Granville. By the kindness of the noble Lord, she had been allowed to take broken meat from his house, and in doing so she tied it in a napkin, which she afterwards attempted to pawn. The magistrate thought the larcenous intention was not legally made out. At the same time he was of opinion that she was not free from blame, and might possibly have been considered on a different charge.

FRANCE—THE COMMERCIAL TREATY, 1860.—QUESTION.

MR. EATON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, as the Commercial Treaty with France expired on the 15th March, and as the New Treaty has not yet received the sanction of the French Assembly, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to resort to the Commercial Relations existing between this Country and France prior to 1860; and, if not, what course they will adopt pending the acceptance of the New Treaty or in the event of its non-acceptance by the French Assembly?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Question of the hon. Member embraces two branches—the first having reference to the measures we propose to adopt in consequence of the New Treaty not having been accepted by the French Assembly, and the next as to the course to be taken by us in the event of the rejection of that Treaty. As to the first, it does not appear to us to call for any measures at all. There is no doubt that for the present the matter is suspended; but the effect of that suspension is beneficial to us, inasmuch as it insures to us the continuance of the rates of duty accorded to us by the Treaty of 1860; and, of course, as the hon. Member is aware, no change could be made on this side of the water except by legislation, which we certainly do not contemplate proposing for that purpose. With regard to the course to be taken in case of the final rejection of the Treaty, that must depend on the circumstances of the case. In the meantime, we are not very willing to anticipate that such will be the result of the deliberations of the Assembly.

10 GEO. IV. CHAP. 7.—QUESTION.

MR. P. J. SMYTH asked Mr. Attorney General, If section sixteen of tenth George the Fourth, chapter seven, has been repealed; and, if not, to what extent, if any, an Act abolishing Tests in Dublin University and Trinity College may be affected by it?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, the section of the Act referred to by the hon. Member had not been repealed, and the Bill abolishing Tests in the University of Dublin would not in any manner affect it. That section merely limited the effect of the Emancipation Act, and no Act passed outside the Emancipation Act was affected by it.

RUSSIA—THE CRIMEAN CEMETERIES.
QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to carry out the recommendations contained in the Report of General Adye and Colonel Gordon with reference to the Crimean Cemeteries, and, in particular, whether they propose to erect on Cathcart's Hill "a large obelisk, or general memorial" to the memory of the Officers and Men of the British Army who fell in the Crimean war?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, on this subject I have made inquiry at the Treasury, and the Correspondence between the Treasury and the War Office is still proceeding. When that Correspondence is concluded of course there will be no objection to its production. The Treasury have consented to pay for covering the less important of the cemeteries in the Crimea with mounds of earth, for moving the monuments of the Redan into the nearest large cemetery, and for repairing the inscriptions. The Treasury, however, felt they would not be justified in sanctioning any outlay for re-building the walls of the larger cemeteries, for erecting a general memorial, or for the maintenance of a garden,—not from any want of sympathy or unwillingness to provide the amount which might be required, but because it would fail to accomplish the objects in view in any satisfactory and lasting manner.

JURY LIST ALLOWANCES—MAGISTRATES' CLERKS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BRISE asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to the disallowances for fees to magistrates' clerks upon the allowance of Jury Lists, by the Poor Law Auditors; and whether, as these fees can be legally claimed by the Act 25 and 26 Vic. c. 27, he considers it desirable that there should be any further legislative enactment for a satisfactory solution of the difficulty?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, he was advised that the disallowances were correctly made, and he had requested the Attorney General, therefore, to deal with the case by a clause to be inserted in the Juries Bill now before the House.

PARLIAMENT—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE
—"THE PALL MALL GAZETTE."

MR. MUNSTER: I rise, Sir, to draw your attention and that of the House to an article which appeared in The Pall Mall Gazette of Monday, the 31st of March.

Then the hon. Member having delivered in the said paper, and the paragraph referred to, read as follows:—

"The scene of Friday night shows how lamentably Mr. Gladstone's sense of public propriety has been perverted by his fretful irritation at a rebuke the more painful because it was felt to be merited. It was not surprising that the Irish Ultramontane Members should resort to every quibble discoverable in the technicalities of the law of Parliament to defeat or delay a measure like Mr. Fawcett's, which cuts the ground from under their venal agitations and their traffic in noisy disloyalty."

MR. MUNSTER: I rise with considerable diffidence to speak upon any matter touching the liberty of the Press, because I wish to give writers, who have done so much for the cause of liberty in this country, the greatest possible freedom. I feel it my duty, as a Member for an Irish constituency, to illustrate the difference between the law as applied in Ireland and as applied in England, more especially at a time when a severe sentence has just been passed upon the editor of an Irish newspaper at Belfast. The paragraph in The Pall Mall Gazette contains very serious charges against Members of this House—in the first place, that of venality; and, in the second, that of disloyalty—a charge which, apart from its own heinous character, involves in a Member of this House the additional guilt of breach of oath. I am, however, fortified in the course I am taking by a series of precedents which I have found in the records of the former proceedings of this House. I find that reflections upon the character of the Members of this House, or upon a single Member, have always been considered a Breach of Privilege, when these reflections were such as to be of a libellous character, as I conceive the expressions I complain of are. The course adopted on former occasions has been that a Motion should be made "that the article in question contains a Breach of Privileges of this House," and I am prepared to conclude with a Motion to that effect. If that Motion should be acceded to, I am prepared further to move that the printer and publisher of the paper should be ordered to attend at the Bar of this House to-morrow. On the 5th of August last year a similar case occurred. A letter was written to a Member of this House of which complaint was made, and the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Mr. T. Cave) brought the matter before the House. The debate was adjourned, and on the second day, on an apology being made for the letter complained of, the matter was allowed to drop. I refer to this case because I wish to fortify my opinion by the dictum of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), whose authority stands very high in questions relating to the Privileges and proceedings of this House. In the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the letter then complained of unquestionably contained expressions that were libellous, but the libel did not directly refer to Members of this House. The charge made was one of the two charges made in this case, that of venality and corrupt motives. The opinion expressed was that, had the charge referred to Members of this House, it would have been a Breach of Privilege; but, as it did not distinctly refer to Members of this House, there was no breach committed, and therefore the right hon. Member said he should vote against the Motion. In this case the charges distinctly referred to Members of the House, in their capacity as Members, in connection with their action in the House, and their "resort to every quibble discoverable in the technicalities of the law of Parliament to defeat or delay a measure like Mr. Fawcett's, which cuts the ground from under their venal agitations and their traffic in noisy disloyalty." The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the said article contains libellous reflections upon certain Members of this House in breach of the Privileges of this House."—
(Mr. Munster.)

MR. DISRAELI: I know nothing more of the words complained of than I could catch as they were read from the Table, and, not having them before me, I speak with diffidence about them; but, as far as I could collect the meaning of the language, a charge was made against certain persons who were described as "Ultramontane Members" of this House. There was no specific allusion to any particular individual, and I do not know who the "Ultramontane Members" are. In order to justify an attack upon the liberty of the Press, and to warrant the occupation of the valuable time of this House by going into a Question of Privilege, there is certain previous information we ought to be in possession of. Therefore, I hope, before the Question is put, some Gentleman who is authorized, will tell us whether there are any Ultramontane Members in this House, and, if there be, who they may be. Having that information, we can proceed to discuss the language which is complained of, and I shall then give it my candid consideration.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I did not intend to take any part in this debate; but I think I should be wanting in duty to my constituents, and in loyalty to my hon. Friend who has felt it his duty to make this Motion, if I did not point out to the House that, whoever may be described as an Ultramontane Member—which is not uncommonly used as a term of opprobrium—at any rate, there can be no doubt as to whom this article is intended to designate. [Cries of Whom?] It designates those who took a particular course on a particular occasion in reference to the introduction of the Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). It describes those hon. Members of the House as Ultramontane Members, and it speaks of them as “trafficking in noisy disloyalty,” besides alluding to their “venal agitation.” There are other portions of this article which have not been read, but which are equally offensive, but probably are not equally open to a charge of Breach of the Privileges of this House. But whilst I am quite aware that the Irish Members present a fair target for the comments of public writers and public speakers—whether in the House of Commons or out of it—yet I think the House of Commons will itself so far interpose as to protect any portion of its Members, from whatever quarter of the United Kingdom they may come, from charges of venality and disloyalty. What can be the meaning of the term “venal,” except that their conduct has been actuated by the base motive of desiring to obtain money, or some other material consideration? What can be meant by the term “disloyalty,” except to charge them with conduct that would make them unworthy to be Members of this House. I think this House will do well—if it will permit me to say so—to show that it is as careful of the dignity of Members from Ireland as it is of its own dignity. If I were a disloyal Member of this House I should not desire anything better than that this matter should be passed over, and that it should go forth to the people of Ireland that when the Members that Ireland returns to Parliament endeavour to do their duty, and maintain the religion of their country and its interests in the matter of higher education, their reputations are left open to attack, and they may with impunity be charged with venality and disloyalty. I assure the House that until this moment I did not intend to take any part in this debate—I only heard of the matter incidentally, and I bought the paper in order to read the article; and when the right hon. Gentleman opposite learns that the so-called Ultramontanes are clearly pointed out and described in this article, I think he will probably be inclined to modify his opinion, and to admit that a Breach of the Privilege of this House has been committed.

MR. MCCARTHY DOWNING begged to say that he also had not the slightest idea of taking any part in this debate, but certainly after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), who seemed to think that there was no Irish Member in that House who would avow that he was an Ultramontane Member, yet, according to the true sense and meaning of the word, he (Mr. Downing) rose to say that he was one. There could be no question that it was clearly intended who the Members in that House were that the article pointed to, because it directed attention to those Irish Members who defeated the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), and it then went on to say that those Ultramontane Members were guilty of venality and disloyalty. He, as one of those Ultramontane Members, denied that he was a venal Member or a disloyal one. He had no hesitation in saying that if such language were used with reference to any body of Gentlemen in that House, English or Scotch, there would not be a Member who would not pronounce the opinion that it was a high Breach of Privilege in imputing to any number of Gentlemen in that House that they were capable of acting corruptly, because venality meant corruption, whether that venality was purchased by money, or from any other unworthy motive. Therefore he was utterly surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire should endeavour, in the manner he had done, to prevent this matter from being considered calmly and deliberately in that House; and that the Leader of a great party should have taken this opportunity of saying what the right hon. Gentleman did of observations which he, as an Irish Member, thoroughly despised. It was due, however, to the Members of the party which defeated the Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton, that they should be protected as much as other hon. Members were. To show that the House would be justified in assenting to the present Motion, he would refer to the precedent in the case of Mr. Joseph K. Aston. A Motion was made that that individual should attend at the Bar of the House for having committed a Breach of Privilege by issuing a circular which requested Members to attend in their places in order to prevent a count-out, which would probably "emanate from parties personally interested, as money-lenders and agents, in debarring the Clergy" and others from the benefit of the improvements contemplated by a Bill relating to pensions. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) stated that this letter did not apply to any individual Member or Members of that House, but that it had reference to other persons—namely, money-lenders and agents outside that House. The right hon. Gentleman added, however, that there would clearly have been a Breach of Privilege if particular Members had been referred to. The present case was entirely different. The Ultramontane party were distinctly referred to as being guilty of venality and disloyalty. For his own part, he had never been afraid of expressing his opinions, and he now asserted that he was as loyal to the Queen as any English or Scotch Member of that House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I am sure that everybody must sympathise very strongly with the feelings of any hon. Member of this House who deems his character to have been aspersed and his loyalty called into question; and no excuse or apology is needed on the part of the hon. Gentlemen who have brought this matter forward on account of the article to which they have called attention. Everybody must sympathise with them if the article were really intended to asperse the motives and characters of hon. Members. Nobody reading the article can sympathise with it, and every Member of the House of Commons must feel that the matter is well worthy of the attention of the House. I agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, that it is a serious matter if the honour and character of Members of this House are publicly aspersed. Certainly it is a matter which cannot be got rid of by a joke. While, however, the Privileges of Parliament ought to be maintained, and while it is most desirable for this House to assert its dignity when it is called in question, it is also most important that the Privileges of Parliament should not be extended, and that we should not commit ourselves to a course from which, if we happened to be in error, we should find it difficult to retreat with dignity. It is, therefore, most desirable that in any step this House may take it should found itself on Parliamentary precedent and be guided by Parliamentary law. Now, I find it laid down in the clearest terms in the book which is always referred to as the authority on questions of this kind—Sir Erskine May's Law and Practice of Parliament—that in order to constitute a Breach of Privilege, it is not sufficient to attack the characters of Members of the House, but the characters of Members of the House must be attacked in their capacity as Members. If they are accused of doing anything discreditable it does not amount to a Breach of Privilege unless they are accused of doing so as Members of the House of Commons. There might be in the House—although I do not for a moment mean to suggest that there are at the present time—Members whose private character and conduct outside the House would become a subject of observations. That would be a fair matter for observations, and if libels were published such persons would have the ordinary means of redress. But such observations are not a Breach of the Privileges of Parliament. The book I just alluded to says—

"Libels upon Members have also been constantly punished; but to constitute a Breach of Privilege they must concern the character and conduct of Members in that capacity."

That is, in the capacity of Members of Parliament. Now, as I followed the language of the article, which I heard for the first time, it is to this effect:—

"It is not surprising that certain Members of the House should resort to every quibble dis-

coverable in the technicalities of the law of Parliament to delay or defeat a measure like Mr. Fawcett's."

So far, I apprehend there is no Breach of Privilege. It is perfectly legitimate to say that Members resorted to any quibbles in Parliamentary law to which they may be disposed. We should commit ourselves to a very undesirable position if we were to suggest that such an observation as that was a Breach of the Privileges of Parliament. The article proceeds to say that Mr. Fawcett's measure "cuts the ground from under their venal agitation, and their traffic in noisy disloyalty." As I understand, neither "venal agitation" nor "traffic in disloyalty" could take place in the capacity of Members of Parliament. Neither "venal agitation" nor "noisy disloyalty" can be applied to anyone in his capacity as a Member of this House. As I can lay down no law for myself, I can only appeal to that authority to which we all defer. I venture to submit that matter, Sir, to you, who are, after all, the authority of this House, and to ask you whether the construction which I have suggested, and on which I myself offer no opinion, is, or is not, a tenable construction. If it be, I think everyone will be glad that the Privileges of Parliament, while honestly maintained, should never be extended, and that we should not embark on a course from which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to retreat with dignity.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS: I am not an Ultramontane, and, therefore, the matter does not affect me. The Attorney-General has told us what he considers to be the law of the matter; but I am afraid we do not all quite understand his law. I think he has come to a conclusion which many of us on the other side of the water do not agree with. We must all agree that the language which has been read from the Table is, to say nothing more, disgraceful. But whether legally it is a Breach of Privilege I do not know. There can be no doubt, however, what is meant by the article; and I do not think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) has added much to his laurels by treating the matter as a joke. There are Members in the House who feel the matter most deeply, and if my hon. Friend goes to a division I shall vote for the Motion. Under the circumstances, however, I should not recommend him to go to a division.

MR. OSBORNE: I apprehend that the House has been as much taken by surprise as myself at this debate, which has been brought on without Notice. I cannot think that the few words containing the legal opinion of the Attorney-General are very satisfactory. It sounded to me very much like Nisi Prius, and I do not think it was the proper way in which to allude to this matter. I hope the House will not be led away by the term "Ultramontane," for I confess I am one of those who do not know exactly what it means. I have heard the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government himself called Ultramontane, and I have heard every Gentleman who advocates religious freedom to the Roman Catholics called Ultramontane. In fact, Ultramontanism is one of those big words which are forged for these occasions. The case is simply this:—A number of Roman Catholic Gentlemen, who sit on this side of the House, who vote as honourably and as conscientiously as their Protestant fellow-countrymen, have been grossly insulted on this print, and I do not think a proper construction has been put upon the few words which fell from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli). I am sure that he treats the matter in the same way that I do. He places no sort of reliance or authority on this print; but he gives the best and most friendly advice to the Roman Catholics to treat this attack with the contempt it deserves. I think the right hon. Gentleman has been misunderstood. Whether the law of the matter has been made clearer by the Attorney-General is a different thing. I think he has rather forced a division on the hon. Gentleman who brought forward the Motion. That hon. Member is a young and adventurous man, who has to-day taken his seat in this House after a long tour in America, where, in his absence, he was "killed." As a much older Member of this House, I would advise him to be content with having brought the matter under the notice of the House. They well knew that the Roman Catholic Members for Ireland were as conscientious, as incapable of venal practices, and noisy disloyalty, as any other Members of the House. Let the hon. Member be content with having brought the matter before the House; but let him not bring up the poor printer and publisher to the Bar of the House. That is only a matter of form, for he will not get at the man who wrote this article. It is an insulting article, and let it be treated with the contempt which such articles deserve when they are applied to an honourable body in this House.

MR. RONAYNE said, he was opposed to the introduction of this Motion, because he was opposed to any limitation of free discussion by the Press. They had in Ireland suffered so much from the "gagging laws" passed by that House on their Press that they ought to be the last people to interfere with the freedom of the Press in this country. Being a Home Ruler, he approved of such articles. He thought that the articles which appeared in the leading journals of England reflecting the opinions and prejudice of the English people were the strongest instruments for promoting the agitation of Home Rule and self-government, and he should be sorry to see them interfered with by that House. These articles had done more to promote Home Rule in Ireland than even the injurious and unjust laws which had been recently passed against Ireland. They do for Ireland what they had done for America—there they helped to keep alive the Alabama Claims, till England was compelled to pay them. Here they would promote the demand for Home Rule until England would be compelled to grant it. These things affected Irishmen much, for they were a sensitive and a proud people, and the joke perpetrated by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) would have the same effect in Ireland that another speech of his had, when the right hon. Gentleman responded to the three cheers which were given for the famine in Ireland by his constituents in Buckinghamshire. Those cheers were rankling to this moment in the bosom of the Irish people, who would never forget them.

MR. MUNSTER: I think the House will pardon me for saying a few words in reply to the observations which have been made upon this subject. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) raised the question whether there were any Ultramontane Members of the House, and hinted that they were an indistinct body. A good many years back, the great Daniel O'Connell was called to his place in Parliament, and there reprimanded for having committed a Breach of Privilege in a speech delivered outside the House. The people he spoke of were the Tories. He said the Tories had perjured themselves. I might ask the right hon. Gentleman if there are any Tories in this House. But, passing to a more serious point, I would answer the objection of the Attorney General, who said that the Members alluded to are not spoken of in their capacity of Members. I would ask, who are spoken of? The words used are "Ultramontane Members." If it does not apply to the Ultramontane Members I should like to know to whom it does apply? I do not complain of the words "quibbling" and "technicality," but I complain of the expressions "venal agitation" and "noisy disloyalty." I am anxious that the Press should have the fullest liberty, and in bringing forward my Motion I only wished to draw attention to the Press on this side of the Channel in order that the like liberty might be granted to the Press on the other side. I feel obliged to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) for his jocose advice, but still I feel it my duty to go to a division on the subject.

MR. GLADSTONE: There is one portion of this article which, notwithstanding it has been alleged to be a Breach of Privilege, as part of the subject-matter of this charge against the editor of a certain newspaper, is clearly not so. I allude to the first two sentences, of which I am the hero. I think that no one will be disposed to assert that this sentence contains any Breach of the Privileges of this House, and I submit that if the hon. Member (Mr. Munster) really intends to persevere with his Motion, he should not include a passage which is entirely distinct, and which is not a Breach of the Privileges of this House. I will venture to go a little further, and join in the representations which have been addressed to the hon. Gentleman not to press his Motion to a division. I have several times heard Motions of this kind made in this House, and have known cases in which the editors of newspapers have been brought to the Bar. The House naturally feels a very great disinclination to refuse a Motion of this kind, particularly when it feels—as I think it does feel—that a charge made perhaps against the hon. Gentleman, and certainly against several hon. Members, is totally unjust and unfounded. There may be some difficulty in refusing his Motion, but if the House feels that difficulty, let me point out to him, with great respect, that it is a real reason why he should not press the House to adopt it. What good can arise from the Motion? If unjust charges of this kind are made—as from time to time they will be made, considering the heat and haste with which the articles of the journals are of necessity produced—they inflict no real injury upon those against whom they are directed. Now, I think it is far better for this House and for the Members of this House to take their stand upon the consciousness of their endeavours to do their duty, and of the knowledge that that endeavour is duly appreciated by the people of this country, who do not lose sight of this fact in reading the intemperate expressions which occasionally find their way into the newspapers. I cannot help thinking that it would be unwise if the House were to act upon this Motion. I have never seen any of these attempts do any good, and, with the fullest sympathy for the hon. Gentleman and those who feel themselves aggrieved, I think, not only that he has done sufficient, but that what he has done has been perfectly justifiable and right, not only on his own, but on the part of his friends in calling attention to this matter. I would, therefore, venture to hope—the more so, perhaps, as his experience as a Member of this House has not largely accumulated—that he will be content with the discussion he has evoked, and wisely forbear to press his Motion to a division.

SIR JOHN ESMONDE trusted that, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and the very satisfactory expression of feeling on the part of the House, that his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion. He should not have made that request but for the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because what had fallen from the Attorney General would, without that speech, have rendered a division almost imperative.

MR. MUNSTER said, that, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and in deference to the general feeling of the House, he felt bound to withdraw his Motion. He could not help adding that his satisfaction at the expression of opinion on the part of the House was greater than could be afforded by any result which might attend its passing.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BRASSEY, in rising to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of the Naval Reserves, expressed his regret, in which they would all share, at the death of Mr. Graves, in whom the British seaman had lost a sincere friend and an able advocate. In discussing the question of Naval Reserve it should be remembered that the personnel was far more important and more difficult to create than the matériel of the Navy, and that the training required for the man-of-war's-man of modern times was more elaborate than was formerly necessary. History conclusively proved the essential importance of a merchant navy to any naval power, and if it was fair to take the mercantile navy as a basis to determine the relative strength of different maritime Powers, the situation of this country was pre-eminently satisfactory. The tonnage of the mercantile fleet of England was 7,142,000 tons, that of the United States 1,500,000 tons; Germany, 1,305,000 tons; France, 1,077,000 tons; and that of Russia 250,000 tons. With such advantages we ought to be absolutely secure against attack, and able to exercise a decisive influence in all questions of foreign policy, and especially the Eastern question, in which our interests were intimately involved. But, unfortunately, our maritime population no longer showed any tendency to increase, and our Naval Reserve, in consequence, exhibited a proportionate diminution of strength. The Royal Commission of 1859 recommended that the standard of strength for the Naval Reserve should be maintained at 20,000 men, and for the Naval Coast Volunteers at 10,000 men. The actual strength of the Reserve in 1866 was 17,000, and in 1873 it had been reduced to 12,000 men. The Naval Coast Volunteers scarcely exceeded 600. Considering the great changes which had taken place in the Navy since 1859, he thought a renewal of the inquiry which then took place most desirable, and that was his reason for now moving for the appointment of a Committee. He thought the reduction in the number of the Naval Reserve was very much to be regretted. As to the efficiency of the Reserve, we had had repeated assurances of a very satisfactory character from Admirals Cooper Key, Warren, Elliot, and others, by whom the Reserve had been officially inspected. The Reserve, however, might be made much more effective than it was if greater liberality were displayed in providing the necessary facilities for naval gun drill. The greater number of the guns on board the training ships of the Reserve were 32-pounder smooth-bores. Of 6½-ton guns—by comparison the general armament of iron-clads—there were only two on board the training ship, at which the whole of the Reserve men residing in the London district, some 1,200 in number, were trained. He might add that the cost of the ammunition was not an element for consideration in this case, as the guns on board the President were never fired. He had of late attended frequently at drill on board the President. Pulling the same ropes and manning the same winch-handles with the men, he had opportunities of forming an opinion of their personal qualities, and he could testify that the men belonging to the Reserve, as a rule, took a deep interest in their work. The Reserve suffered, however, in point of efficiency; not only from the want of more perfect appliances for drill, but also from the want of any pecuniary encouragement to attain the highest possible degree of efficiency. Under the rules, which until very lately were in force, a uniform rate of pay was given to every seaman in the Reserve, irrespective of his conduct or proficiency in drill. In the Navy, the system of rewarding good discipline and efficiency by pecuniary advantages had been developed to the greatest possible extent. In the gunnery line, more especially, the various classes of pecuniary rewards had been conceived in the most liberal spirit.

Mr. Brassey

If this system were found necessary in the Navy, where they had the means of preserving discipline and creating another and higher stimulus to exertion through the influence of an admirable esprit de corps, how much more necessary must it be in the Reserve, where the men were never assembled together long enough to afford their officers an opportunity of establishing a personal influence over the men? The revised rules contained a provision for giving a badge, with an allowance of 1*d.* a day, for every Royal Naval Reserve man passed out from the drill-ships as a trained man. The pay was the same as in the Navy; but in the Navy the seamen had an opportunity of earning 365 pence in the year; whereas, in the 28 days during which the Naval Reserve men were at drill they could not earn more than 2*s.* 4*d.* Again, the seaman in the Navy, on becoming a trained man in gunnery, was merely on the bottom round of the ladder. There were an infinite number of rewards for proficiency in gunnery to which he could attain; whereas the ultimate reward of the Naval Reserve man was limited to the paltry sum which he had named. He would recommend that a trained man in the Reserve should receive a gratuity of £1. The additional expense to the country would be slight, and they would at least have the satisfaction of knowing that the men who earned the gratuity possessed a respectable knowledge of the most essential part of a man-of-war's-man's duties. Within the last week a revised code of rules had been promulgated for the Reserve, containing amendments on the old rules, all of which he heartily approved. Almost every improvement which could be carried out without spending more money had been effected. The Government might object to the proposals which he had to make, because they involved some additional expense. He sympathised with the Admiralty in their anxiety to keep down expenditure, for there could be no doubt that in consequence of the increase that had taken place in the price of materials and in wages, and in consequence of the altered conditions of naval architecture, the old estimate of £1,000 per gun for a ship of war had been advanced to about £100,000 per gun; but, compared with the tremendous outlay on our iron-clad ships, the cost of carrying out his suggestions would be an insignificant item. The present scale of naval expenditure, if set down at an average of £10,000,000 a-year, constituted but a very moderate premium of insurance against the dangers of invasion or the anxiety and disgrace of a sudden panic. In 1858 the total value of our imports and exports was £234,000,000 and the tonnage of our merchant vessels was 4,211,000 tons. The value of our trade in 1870 was £547,000,000, and the tonnage of our shipping was 5,633,000 tons; while the expenditure on the Navy had been reduced, in the interval, from £10,590,000 in 1858, to £9,900,000 in 1872. He would now point out those other improvements which he regarded as essentially necessary. Why, he asked, were the numbers of the Reserve so considerably reduced? To some extent that reduction was due to the greater care exercised in the admission of candidates for enrolment, and to the dismissal of ill-conducted and inefficient men. The rules, however, formerly in force excluded a considerable number of seamen in every way qualified for the Reserve. Seamen could not be re-entered unless they were actually serving at sea. Under this rule many experienced seamen were ineligible. Again, the qualifications excluded all but bond-fide seamen from the second-class Reserve. Fishermen and boatmen were ineligible. Under the revised code, however, an acquaintance with square-rigged vessels, and residence on board a training ship while at drill, were no longer necessary. Under the regulations originally drawn up, the seaman enrolled in the second-class Reserve in the Port of London was compelled to attend drill on board the Penelope at Harwich, while the seaman of the first-class Reserve was allowed to remain at home and drill on board the President in the West India Dock. All that it was desirable to alter in the regulations as to qualification had been altered in the revised rules; but he much regretted that the allowance for travelling expenses was not more liberal. For seamen residing in London, there was only one ship or battery at which they could be drilled—namely, the President in the West India Docks. Either there should be another drill ship, on the Surrey side of the river, or the seamen's expenses in travelling to and fro should be paid. The removal of the restrictions on enrolment for the Reserve would, he hoped, have the effect of adding considerably to their numbers. But the severity of the restrictions was not the only reason why it had been found impracticable to keep up the number to the standard recommended by the Royal Commission. There were two other causes at work, the first of which was the tendency in our maritime population to decrease, owing to the immense increase in the number of steamers, which did not require so large a proportion of sailors as sailing vessels; and the second cause of diminution was found in the material reduction that had taken place in the proportion of sailors required in comparison to the tonnage of vessels. Since the opening of the Suez Canal, shipbuilders had been employed almost exclusively in the construction of steamers. In 1864 the total tonnage of the Mercantile Marine was 7,103,000 tons. In 1871 it was 7,142,000 tons. But while the tonnage of steam vessels in 1864 was 770,000 tons, it had increased to 1,412,000 tons in 1871. In 1868, 237,687 tons of sailing vessels were built, and 78,508 tons of steam vessels. In 1871 only 56,545 tons of sailing vessels were built, but the construction of steamers had increased to 297,810 tons. Again, owing to the substitution of iron for wood, the proportion of our ships was very different from what it was. Mechanical appliances had been multiplied. Patent blocks, steam winches, and other substitutes for manual labour had been introduced; and the result was that whereas, in 1854, the proportion of seamen to every 100 tons was 4·7, it had been reduced to 3·25 in 1870. It should not be forgotten that the value of the commerce which our Navy would be called on to protect in case of war had vastly increased, and that the withdrawal of our troops from the Colonies would make the task of defending them more exclusively than heretofore the work of the Navy. It had been stated that the number of British seamen had diminished by the introduction of foreigners; but this was not the case. In 1864 the number of foreigners in British ships constituted 12·6 per cent of the whole number of seamen employed. The percentage had been reduced in 1870 to 10·1. It was also affirmed that the seamen had not only diminished in number, but that they were inferior, both in character and skill, to their predecessors; but it was difficult to reconcile this opinion with the fact that our ships were manned by a smaller number of hands, made quicker passages than ever before, and were never laid up in winter. But in such matters they could not venture to dispute too obstinately with those who had the best opportunities of forming an opinion. The reports from Liverpool were most decided on this subject. The inferiority of our seamen, so far as it existed, might partly be attributed to the increase in the number of steamers. But in the Mercantile Marine, where speedy transit was all-important, the substitution of steamers for sailing vessels was, in many branches of the shipping trade, inevitable; and, pro tanto, the Mercantile Marine would not be so good a school as it used to be for training seamen for the Navy. The inferiority of our seamen had also been attributed to the abolition of compulsory apprenticeship. The repeal of the Navigation Laws had led to a great reduction in the number of apprentices enrolled. The number was—in 1845, 15,704; in 1846, 10,370; and in 1871, 4,111. The annual waste of British seamen was computed at 10,000, of whom, unhappily, 3,000 were lost by drowning. We had only 4,000 apprentices, and therefore 6,000 seamen must be supplied from foreign countries, or at least without apprenticeship. In the interests of the Navy, it was necessary to do something to increase the supply and improve the quality of seamen in the merchant service. The shipowners, however, were perfectly able to take care of themselves. There was no difficulty in obtaining men for steamers, because men on steamers were paid higher wages. The wages of ordinary seamen had not been increased for the last 20 years, and as seamen could turn their hands to anything, it could scarcely be a matter of surprise if many of them sought employment on shore in better paid and less arduous occupations. The training in the Navy itself far surpassed any other; but it cost £55 per head for every boy under training, as against £25 per head for boys trained in the ships maintained by philanthropic societies. The difference was caused partly by additional instructors. The ships of the philanthropic societies rendered, however, excellent service. The Marine Society of London supplied 167 boys to the Navy in 1871, and since its foundation, in 1756, the Society had sent 26,754 lads into the service. But more instructors and better appliances were necessary in these ships, and, above all, brigs should be attached to the stationary vessels, in which the more efficient lads could be sent for a cruise at sea. The training-ship maintained by the City of New York was kept constantly cruising in Long Island Sound. The expense of giving this more complete instruction was beyond the scope of private philanthropy, and it was questionable whether the Government should not assist these societies. The Royal Commission of 1859, at whose suggestion the Naval Reserve was established, strongly recommended that 12 school ships should be established at the principal ports, each capable of receiving 200 boarders, of whom 100 should be nominated by the State. After an apprenticeship of four years the young seamen entered in these vessels would be eligible for the Reserve. A somewhat similar plan had been proposed by Sir Frederick Grey; and Mr. Thomas Gray, of the Board of Trade, had suggested that the Government should take over one of the ships now maintained as a philanthropic institution on the Thames, and one of those on the Mersey, and that all boys entered in either of the ships taken over by the Government should, in consideration of the superior training which they would receive, and which would probably enable them to command superior wages in the merchant service, agree to serve for a year in the Navy on the completion of their apprenticeship, and afterwards to join the Reserve. Another proposition which he most earnestly commended to the consideration of the House was that the Government should encourage owners of ships of an approved class to take apprentices, by giving a bonus for every apprentice on board their ships who had been duly indentured to the Registrar General as a Government apprentice, and had agreed, on the completion of his apprenticeship, to serve in the Navy for a year, and afterwards to join the Reserve. The number of apprentices should be limited—say one for every 100 tons—and the ships should be of an approved class. A bounty of £5 might be paid to the apprentice on joining the Navy for his year of service.

The advantage of this plan over that of training-ships was that it would be both more practicable and less expensive. The officers of the Reserve also demanded attention. The half-pay list of the Navy contained a multitude of names of officers without private means, and eager for employment. Could not this be remedied by first creating a Reserve of officers in the Mercantile Marine, and then reducing the number of officers in the Navy to something like the number actually required in time of peace? Young gentlemen, socially qualified for service in the Navy, were being educated on board the Conway, in the Mersey, and the Worcester, in the Thames. If the Admiralty were to afford to these officers a competent knowledge of gunnery, we should have in them an invaluable reserve of officers. For this purpose a short practical course of gunnery and naval tactics should be arranged, in connection with the Excellent, analogous to the course of military instruction for Volunteer officers at Aldershot. Eligible young officers of the Mercantile Marine should be encouraged to go through the course by the offer of a premium, to be paid to them on their passing a satisfactory examination. The premium should be sufficient in amount to cover the expense of their residence in Portsmouth, and also to compensate them for their loss of income while remaining on shore for the purpose of study. The Board of Trade would do much to promote the success of this scheme by raising the standard of examination for the extra master's certificate, so as to include both modern languages and the more important elements of commercial science. The privilege of going through the course on board the Excellent might be confined to officers who had passed this higher examination. The creation of the Naval Academy at Greenwich would doubtless do much to facilitate the fusion between the officers of the Reserve and the Navy, which, from every point of view, was much to be desired. From the Royal Naval Reserve he would turn to the Coast Volunteers. Recent naval administrators had unaccountably neglected this branch of the Reserves. The Committee of 1852 recommended a force of 6,000 Coast Volunteers, and the Royal Commission of 1859 advised that the number should be fixed at 10,000 men. According to the latest estimates, the number had been reduced to 600. It could not be said that eligible men were wanting. The latest Return showed that 153,000 men and 14,000 boys were employed in the fisheries of the United Kingdom. In point of physical power the fishermen were superior to the seamen in foreign trades. Their local knowledge would be of immense value in coast defence, and the fact that they had fixed places of residence, and never sailed under a foreign flag, made it certain they would always be found when required. Of their moral character he could speak with the greatest confidence. The Coast Volunteer was not popular in the Navy, because the men originally enrolled, were admitted into the service for political purposes with discreditable laxity; but it would not be difficult to raise from among our fishermen a Reserve equal to the standard recommended by the Royal Commission. He trusted, from a perusal of the revised rules, that there was a disposition to induce the fishermen to join, not the Naval Coast Volunteers, but the second-class Naval Reserve. The means, however, which were proposed for carrying out this policy were inadequate. The fishermen were congregated in isolated communities on various points of the coast. They were men of domestic habits, and it would be difficult to induce them to join the Reserve if they had to be drilled far from home. The list of ships and batteries at which the Naval Reserve might take their drill, though imposing enough in point of numbers, did not include some of the most important fishing communities. There were batteries at Poole, where the number employed in fishing vessels was only 214; at Maryport, where there were only 69; and at Lynn, where there were only 266; but there were no establishments at Sligo, which had 4,800 men and boys in the fishing vessels of the port; none at Skibbereen, which had 5,500; none at Banff, which had 5,600; at Stornoway, which had 8,000; at Wick, which had 8,400; nor at Inverness, which had 9,000 fishermen. The Manning Committee of 1852 strongly recommended that the Scotch naval station should be re-established. Where the Navy was best known, there the flower of the population were ready to enter it. In 1852 there were more men in the Navy from the village of Cawsand, near Plymouth, than from the Port of Liverpool. The Return of the counties in which the boys in training-ships in 1871 were born showed that, out of 2,888 boys, only 90 came from the whole of Scotland, only 112 from Lancashire, including the Isle of Man as well as Liverpool, only 23 from Suffolk, 11 from Norfolk, and 18 from Wales. Could it be supposed that the great seafaring populations on those coasts had ever been made thoroughly acquainted with the advantages of service in the Navy and the Reserve? The fluctuating nature of their occupation would enable the fishermen to attend drill with little inconvenience. The drill could be taught in the most effective manner, and with the least expense to the Government, by sending a gunboat to visit the fishing ports at the slack season. These periodical visits of a smart, well-organized gunboat would do much to create a favourable impression of the Navy among the fishermen. The expense of keeping a few gunboats in commission for this purpose would be nominal; for we had more seamen at present in the home ports than it was possible to employ in sea-going ships. Some of these men might be attached to gunboats instead of remaining in stationary flagships. In addition to the various descriptions of forces already enumerated, an attempt had been made to extend the Volunteer movement to the coast defence service. A corps composed at present of 100 gentlemen employed in banks and private offices in the City had been provisionally enrolled, and several hundred additional applications for admission had been received. The Volunteers actually entered had attended drill on board the President, and he was enabled to state that, in the opinion of the instructors, they were the most intelligent gunners who had ever been drilled on board the ship. The movement had extended itself to Liverpool, where the First Lord of the Admiralty did so much to initiate it by an encouraging speech. It remained to be proved whether the idea was a practical one. Not until the Volunteers had been afloat in a gunboat for a few days, and had shown their ability and readiness to perform all the duties which devolved on a seaman in a gunboat, should he venture to regard the experiment, with which he had the honour to be associated, as an accomplished fact. Much of the success of the Naval Volunteer movement must depend on the readiness of the Admiralty to afford the necessary facilities. The most immediately pressing matter was the appointment of a commanding or inspecting officer. Until the Admiralty placed a naval man of rank and experience at the head of the Volunteers, an invaluable aid to efficiency would be wanting, and the formation of a contingent at many of the ports round the coast would be indefinitely delayed. The formation of an able staff of inspecting officers for the Reserve was essentially necessary to secure their efficiency. The Reserves, including the Coast Guard, now numbered not less than 20,000 men. Surely, the supreme command of such a force was a task worthy of the most distinguished Admiral in the service. The Commander-in-Chief should be supported by a sufficient staff of naval officers, to whom should be assigned the supervision of the Reserves in the St. George's Channel and on the East coast of England. While hitherto there had been no inspecting staff for the Naval Reserve, a very different policy had prevailed at the War Office in providing a staff for the inspection of the land Volunteers. An Admiral sent on an occasional tour of inspection was not a sufficient substitute for an officer specially devoted to the duty. In urging the appointment of a staff officer, he did not undervalue for a moment the services of that admirable body of men, the seamen instructors in gunnery in the drill ships of the Reserve. It was impossible to speak too highly of their zeal, their intelligence, their discipline, and their consummate knowledge of the subject on which it was their duty to give instruction. But naval officers, judiciously selected, would exercise a higher influence over the morale of the Naval Reserve. The merchant seamen would feel themselves, in a larger sense than heretofore, an integral part of the Navy of England. They would be inspired by its great traditions, and the confidence which they would acquire in their officers would be an invaluable guarantee for their conduct and discipline should they ever be called upon to join Her Majesty's service. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the appointment of the Committee.

Mr. LIDDELL, in seconding the Motion, wished to call attention to the alternative scheme which the Commission of 1859 eventually wished the country to adopt. They proposed a Naval Reserve enlisted from the adult seamen as a purely provisional scheme, but pointed out with great force the obvious objections to dependence for all time upon a Reserve raised from the ranks of the adult seamen, and their real scheme was that a Reserve should be formed from boys trained in the school ships, a certain number of whom should be paid for by the State upon condition of their joining the Naval Reserve. The Commissioners said—

"Your Majesty will perceive that for the future maintenance of this force we propose to rely in a great measure on boys specially trained for this purpose, in conformity with the plan adopted in the Navy with so much advantage."

He would not say a word in disparagement of the men now in the Reserve; but it was evident they could not compare with boys trained in discipline and obedience from their early years. They suggested that 12 training ships should be maintained at 12 of the principal ports of this country—and they made the statesmanlike proposal that boys of the merchant service and boys of the Navy should be trained together, so as to form associations which would last through their lives, and promote an esprit de corps that would raise the tone and character of the whole merchant service. But nothing had been done to give effect to this scheme. It had been entirely ignored. There were 13 training ships in this country, and £20,700 of public money was spent upon them, flowing in dribblets through the channels of the penal departments of the Home Office. The Commission recommended that 2,400 boys should be trained, annually in these school ships, and the number of boys in training given by the last Return was 2,300; but many of them were in reformatory ships, and the rest in industrial school ships, to which boys were sent by magistrates' order. That was not the class of boys contemplated by the Royal Commission, who wished the retainer to be an incentive to good conduct offered to boys born of honest parents. But at present not a farthing of public money went towards the support or education for sea service of the children of honest parents; and the moral effect of what we were doing was rather mischievous. It was, of course, perfectly right to assist philanthropic efforts; but we were losing sight of the great principle put forward by the Royal Commissioners. They recommended that £40,000 a-year should be spent on school ships, which would have secured for us the services by this time of many thousands of boys. At the present moment we were spending over £20,000 per annum without educating a single child of honest parents for the sea service of the country, or securing for the Navy a single seaman. He hoped that in saying this he should not be supposed to be passing any stricture upon the existing institutions of this character—they were doing very good work, they deserved all support and assistance but they fell far short of the scheme which had been proposed by the Royal Commissioners. He believed it was very requisite that something should be done to raise the tone of the merchant service. Ever since the merchant navy had been freed from restrictions as to manning and nationality, great difficulty had been experienced in obtaining apprentices, and the want of them was often complained of at this moment. In consequence of the Act 5 & 6 Will. IV. having failed to bring into the Royal Navy a sufficient number of apprentices, pauper boys were forced into the merchant service, but a supply of only 5,000 or 6,000 was obtained. The effect of the compulsory Act, passed in 1844, was to increase the number from 6,259 to 15,740 in the first year of its operation; and when it was repealed the number of apprentices on the Register was over 30,000. In 1854, which was the first year of the absence of regulations with regard to the manning of ships, the number of seamen in the merchant service was 162,000, and the number of apprentices was 8,000; whereas, in 1870, while the number of merchant seamen was 196,000, the number of apprentices was only 4,200. In order to secure for this country in time of emergency an efficient Reserve, we must rely upon the co-operation of the shipowners. [Mr. GOSCHEN: Hear, hear!] He was glad to see that the First Lord of the Admiralty recognized the truth of that remark; but he believed no steps had been taken to obtain the co-operation of the shipowners, either with regard to men or boys. It was very unjust for the Government to take from the shipowners their best men at the very time when it was most inconvenient and dangerous to part with them; and some advantages must be given, either in the form of money payment or in money's worth, in order to compensate the shipowner for being deprived of his best men in an emergency. At present there was a demand on the part of the shipowners for trained apprentices. The Report of the North of England Steam Ship Owners' Association, issued about a year ago, contained a letter addressed to the President of the Board of Trade, in which the following important passages occurred:—

"For some time past considerable difficulties have been encountered by shipowners desirous of obtaining competent seamen to navigate steam vessels. The number of apprentices to the sea has been for several years diminishing, and is now so low and disproportionate to the demands of the service as to cause serious apprehensions respecting the future supply of good and experienced sailors."

That was a very grave statement. The shipowners also said that, of the very fine lines of steamers carrying coal and iron to the London markets from the north-eastern ports not one vessel in ten had an apprentice on board; and if that was true of other ports most lads must be found in sailing vessels. But it was complained that the regulations of the Board of Trade, being confined to lads trained on board sailing vessels, prevented parents sending their boys to sea, because the training they needed for obtaining active employment was only to be obtained on board steam vessels. The Report to which he had referred made this suggestion—

"Having carefully considered the whole question on various occasions, your Committee have arrived at the conclusion that the only way of checking the rapid decline of apprentices in the merchant marine is either to adopt an examination in seamanship and requirements of steam vessels, or to institute for such vessels quite a different mode of examination."

Several suggestions had been made as to the privileges which might be extended to shipowners as a condition of their co-operating with the Government in raising an efficient Naval Reserve. He had heard it suggested on good authority that the Government should offer certain privileges to those shipowners on board whose ships a certain number of apprentices were employed—such as the use of Government dockyards in foreign ports and the right to gratuitous assistance in salvage from Government vessels. It might also be made a condition on which all subsidies were paid that the subsidized ships should carry a certain number of apprentices. He merely threw out these suggestions for consideration; but he wished strongly to impress upon the Government, that however the Naval Reserve might be formed, for its success we must depend upon the assistance of the shipowners. He wished to know what proportion the Reserve of 12,600 men at this moment bore to the Reserve of our ships. Was it adequate, or anything like adequate, to man the ships we might require at sea in case of emergency? To say that we were at peace was to take a narrow view. Recent wars had shown us that success attended the immediate concentration of the largest number of men, and could we presume that nations which had adopted this policy on land would neglect it at sea? The French Government could command the services of every available seaman on the coast in case of emergency, and would the Germans, with their organization, overlook the importance of such an arrangement? It would be short-sighted in us to lose the advantage we possessed for the sake of a few thousands a-year, which would secure us an efficient Reserve. We spent £20,000 annually in dribblets, and secured not a single Reserve seaman for the money, and for £40,000 we could carry out the scheme of the Commissioners. We had done what they recommended as provisional only; but we had not carried out their more important recommendations, and he did not see any attempt to do it. He should like to see service in the Reserves of this country held up, not as a refuge for the destitute, but as an incentive to good conduct to the youth of the country. He should like boys to be taught in their schools that it was a privilege to fight for their country. He wished to see the merchant navy and the Royal Navy brought into more immediate association, and if this were done it would tend to the benefit and security of the country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of the Naval Reserves,"—
(Mr. Brassey.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, the last speaker had called attention to an important point which had previously escaped notice—the proportion of seamen in the Reserve to the number of ships in Reserve. A true Reserve must consist of ships, seamen, and officers; and there must be a due proportion of all three. To ensure a Navy efficient in the event of war we must either keep up a war establishment in time of peace, or else we must train men who would enter into a voluntary obligation to serve in the Navy, adopting the principle which we did in our Army, and which other Powers did in their Armies and Navies. But our naval authorities seemed to adopt the reverse principle, for they had allowed the Reserve of men to fall from 16,000 to 10,000, whilst they increased the number of seamen serving afloat. [Mr. Goschen said, the number was 12,000, and it had never been as low as 11,000]. He did not contend that we had a larger number of men afloat than the affairs of the world required. For several years past he had endeavoured to impress upon the House that an annual drain of strength was going on from the Navy. In 1856 the 10 years' service system was adopted. Consequently in 1866 the services of a considerable number of men expired, and 1,500 men then took their discharge without entering into any engagement to serve again in the Navy if required. In 1871 he was told that 80 per cent. of the men re-entered the Navy; but he found that in 1871 there were 477 men discharged through their service having expired, and 440 men were paid off, making together 917; while the re-entries were only 402, making only 40 per cent. instead of 80. But even if the re-entries were 80 per cent the system was not wise or satisfactory. In 1749 a scheme was proposed by Lord Barrington, then First Lord of the Admiralty, to make an annual allowance to men who had served in the Navy, with the view of rendering their services available in case of necessity, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pelham) pronounced that no scheme was so good for the purpose as retaining supernumeraries at a small annual allowance. The House passed the Resolution, but forgot to vote the money for putting the plan into execution; so like many other abstract Resolutions it was never practically carried out. If that had been done perhaps the country would have been spared all the horrors of impressment, and the Navy would not have fallen into that bad odour which still clung to it among ignorant people. Now that impressment was doomed, it was more imperatively necessary than ever that we should form a Reserve of the trained seamen whom we were now allowing to slip from us without any reason whatever. Not one-third of the seamen were even proposed to be ready for the ships which were supposed to constitute our Reserve. Then, as to officers. Taking the present number of seamen at 39,000, the officers of all grades employed with them would amount to 1,224. They had then to consider the question of how many officers would be needed for the 11,000 or 12,000 who might be called out, and the number would be found totally inadequate. We had not even the sketch of a real Naval Reserve drawn out. What the Admiralty trusted to was to wring out of the House of Commons what money they could for building ships, and then to coax out of the merchant service as many men as they could. They ought to adopt a plan by which they could legitimately add to their maritime strength by discharging men annually into the mercantile marine, and at the same time commanding their services in adequate numbers in the event of war. The whole question urgently required investigation, and he therefore cordially supported the Motion.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said he was also in favour of the proposed inquiry. Of the 12,000 men who might be called out the services of a great many would not be available on the outbreak of a war. It might be useful if a Committee was to direct its attention to the class of men going to China, New Zealand, and California. It had been customary for hon. Members to lecture shipowners as to the number of apprentices they should have on board their ships; but he did not see why they should be bound to employ a certain number of apprentices any more than employers of labour in other professions. He did not believe the number of apprentices was as small as had been represented. He believed sailors were as good as in times past, drunkenness, indeed, having decreased in the merchant navy. He hoped the proposed Committee would be appointed, for it might be useful in preventing unnecessary expenditure.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty would have to speak on some other important questions which stood next on the Notice Paper, he would therefore ask permission of the House to reply to the hon. Member for Hastings. He concurred in the remarks of his hon. Friend on the loss of the late Mr. Graves, who had made this subject almost his own, and whose mercantile experience, sense of public duty, and freedom from party spirit rendered his advice most valuable. His hon. Friend, however, had shown that the task had not fallen into unworthy hands. He began his speech by remarking that though the question of the matériel was one of great importance in relation to the Navy, that of the personnel was of still greater importance. In this he entirely agreed with his hon. Friend. The country had enormous resources in the way of shipbuilding, a Return before him showed that 391,000 tons were added to our merchant service in 1871, as compared with 212,000 tons in 1861, so that were it necessary to renew our fleet within a short time our private shipyards could do so; but if by any mischance a large proportion of the personnel were lost, it would be a difficult task to supply their places. The question of Reserves was, therefore, a very important one, but even here our resources as regarded merchant seamen were great, and he doubted whether, including our Colonial Empire, they did not exceed those of almost all the rest of the world put together. It was often said that the increase of steamers had greatly reduced the number of seamen in sailing vessels; but a Return showed that in 1854 there were 146,500 sailors in sailing vessels in the foreign and coasting trades, and in 1871 the number was 141,000, showing a reduction of only 5,000 men. In our steamers in 1854 there were 15,800 men employed, and in 1871 58,706, so that while there had been an enormous increase in the number of men employed in the steamers of the merchant service, there had been only a slight decrease in the number employed in sailing vessels. This showed that the increase of steam vessels had not operated so prejudicially, as was believed by some, on the sailing vessels. He was sorry to hear his hon. Friend give the weight of his great authority to the statement that our seamen were deteriorating. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) hesitated to express an opinion counter to the authorities quoted by his hon. Friend, particularly Mr. Graves; but when at the Board of Trade he had given great attention to this subject, and had visited all the ports and collected all the facts he could from the Mercantile Marine officers, and could not find that our seamen had deteriorated. Considering that the proportion of seamen to tonnage had greatly diminished, a given number of men doing more work than formerly, and considering also the enormous number of yachts and of seamen employed in them, he could not think there had been any falling off in quality. Steamers did not train men themselves. On the contrary, they paid high wages and wanted the best men. The question of seamen was a question of wages. Those who gave good wages and good accommodation, and sent their men to sea in well-found ships would have no reason to complain of any lack of good men. There were two ways by which a Naval Reserve could be obtained; the one was by passing men more rapidly through the service; the other, by enlisting men from the Merchant Service into a special Reserve. The former was more analogous to what among military men was called the Army Reserve, the latter, to the Militia. If he understood rightly, his hon. and gallant Friend rather advocated the first of these two methods. [Admiral ERSKINE: That of passing them through after their 10 years' service]. He would point out that we had Reserves of both kinds—the Coast-guard and the Naval Pensioners were of the first kind, and the Naval Reserve men of the second kind. If the House would allow him, he would now answer the question put by the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) and others, as to whether the Reserves we had already got were sufficient to man all our vessels. That was, no doubt, an exceedingly important point. He was glad to state that there was every reason to believe from the calculations which had been made that, taking the men in the Service, the supernumeraries in our ports, the Coast-guard and the Naval Pensioners, we had considerably more than would be required to man the 23 ironclads which had been spoken of and every other vessel which we could possibly send to sea within any reasonable period, and a margin of something like 6,000 men would be left besides. How was that possible? The House did not, perhaps, fully understand the great change which had occurred in our requirements as regarded blue-jackets. Every year the number of blue-jackets required in proportion to other men was diminishing. By way of illustration he would take the old three-decker, the Victoria, which had been the flagship in the Mediterranean a very few years ago, and compare it with the Lord Warden, which was now the flagship there, and also with the Devastation, probably the fighting ship of the future. For the Victoria 1,100 men were required, of whom 600 were blue-jackets. For the Lord Warden 600 were sufficient, of whom 230 were blue-jackets. For the Devastation 300 men would suffice, of whom only 100 would be pure blue-jackets. Therefore, supposing we had a fleet of 10 three-deckers like the Victoria, we should require 6,000 blue-jackets, while for 10 Devastations only 1,000 would be required. That showed how much farther the force we now had would go than in former years, and it had a very important bearing on the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1859. If these recommendations were now applied, our resources were not such as we could wish; but with reference to the change which the fleet had been undergoing since that year, our resources were by no means deficient, and at the outbreak of a war we should be in a very good position, indeed. If a war were to arise we should have not only to man all the vessels we possessed, but to take up vessels from the private trade, fit them out as cruisers, and send them to distant parts of the world. During the war between the Northern and Southern States of America the United States Government fitted out no fewer than 750 steamers and manned them with 50,000 men for the purpose of cruising, blockading the ports of the South, and for other purposes. That would be the case with us should war break out. We should have to fit out an enormous number of vessels for various purposes; and though, as he had said, we had sufficient men to supply all our vessels of war, yet we should find employment for all the Reserves we could get. At the same time, it should be borne in mind that all these Reserves would not be employed in the same important work as would be required of the men in the regular fleet; they would not all be employed at the guns. A good deal was to be said in favour of passing men through the Navy into the Reserve, and if we could see our way to do so rapidly, it, no doubt, would be the preferable course. We already educated no fewer than 3,000 boys for the Navy, and that number was sufficient, but not much more than sufficient, to keep up the supply of 18,000 men for our fleet. There was much to be said for increasing the number of boys and passing the men through the fleet. But there was this difficulty. It was alleged by naval men that we had not room in our sea-going cruisers for more boys and young seamen than we had at present. If we were to increase the number of our boys we should be reducing the average age of all the men in the Navy which naval men said could not be done with advantage. The average age was sufficiently low already. But as the proportion of seamen required for ships of war was greatly reduced, it was of infinite importance that they should be thoroughly trained in every respect. It was necessary therefore to maintain the training ships. Therefore, he could not hold out the prospect that we could pass any large number of men rapidly from our fleet into the Reserve. That being so, we must look to the Merchant Service for our Naval Reserve. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey) and others had pointed out that of late years there had been a tendency in the Naval Reserve to diminish in number. That was due, in a great measure, to the stringency of the Regulations of 1869, which were intended to increase the efficiency of the force by weeding it of inferior men. But he could assure the House that subject during the last year had received the most earnest attention. His hon. and gallant Friend (Admiral Erskine) appeared to think that no scheme had been sufficiently considered. But if his hon. and gallant Friend had been at the Admiralty and seen the mass of papers on the subject and the attention which had been given to it, he would have been of a different opinion. The hon. Member for Hastings had alluded to the changes which had taken place with respect to the First and Second Reserve, and seemed to have given his hearty approval to all that had been done in the matter. In the first place, as regarded the First Class Naval Reserve, the Admiralty had greatly increased the number of places where they could be enrolled. Formerly they could be enrolled only at a few places, but now they could at any Coastguard station. The restriction which before prevailed had kept men not only from enrolling, but from re-enrolling themselves after passing through the first five years of service. Twenty-eight days' consecutive drill were formerly required in the First Class Naval Reserve, and that was found to diminish the number who enrolled; but according to the new Regulations which have been framed, the men during the first year were only trained 14 days consecutively, and after the first year they might be drilled not less than seven days at a time. Again, they had provided that the trained men should receive the 1*d.* a day which was now given to the trained men in the fleet, though of course the former received the payment for a month only, while the latter had it throughout the year. His hon. Friend the Member for Hastings appeared to think that was hardly sufficient; but there was considerable difficulty in giving to these trained men a larger amount than the trained men in the fleet. At the same time, he recognized the fact that the Naval Reserve were not underpaid. Their pay was good and amply sufficient. The difficulty did not lie in the direction of pay. They had done one other thing for the trained men—they had offered them a certain proportion—55 per cent of their entries—of appointments in the Coastguard. Hopes to that effect had been held out from the early days of the Naval Reserve, but it was not till now that these hopes had been realized. He now came to the Second Class Naval Reserve, where the changes had been so considerable as almost to amount to re-constituting the force. The Second Class Reserve up to the present time had been almost a total failure from the restrictions imposed by the regulations. Instead of confining

it to seamen who had served in square-rigged vessels, they had opened it to all ordinary seamen and fishermen, who constituted so very large a force in this country, which they hoped would prove a mine of wealth to the Naval Reserve. There had also been an alteration as to the age at which men were to be entered. Instead of the limit as stated by the Regulations of 1869, of 18 to 20 years, the ages at which the men might enter were now to be from 18 to 30; and they had also provided that the Second Class might be enrolled, drilled, and paid at the same time as the First Class Naval Reserve. His hon. Friend the Member for Hastings appeared to think that if, as they hoped, the Second Class Reserve increased very largely the batteries and drill ships would not be sufficient for training purposes. Of course, if they found that fishermen were entering the Second Class Naval Reserve, it would be matter for consideration whether they should not increase the number of batteries or facilitate their being drilled in gunboats or drill ships, as proposed by the hon. Member; but it would be time enough to consider that point when the Second Class Reserve had considerably increased. The new Regulations of which he had spoken had only been completed within the last month. They had been most carefully considered, and had now been issued. There had not been time to ascertain what would be their effect; but he had reason to believe that the number of both Reserves would be considerably increased. He had consulted the Registrar General of Seamen, who was confident in his opinion that when the new Regulations were well known along the coast there would be a large accession of numbers to both First and Second-Class Reserve. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey) had alluded to the want of 6½-ton guns in the Reserve ships; but every one of the Reserve ships had two of these guns, besides others of smaller calibre. His hon. Friend spoke of 1,200 men taking their drill on board the President, but he very much doubted whether there would be more than 250 as an average at one time drilling on board that ship, and there would be nothing like that number in some of the drill ships—not more, perhaps, than 100 being drilled at one time. Spreading their drill over the time allowed, he believed all the men could be trained with the larger guns, and in the first instance they would be trained with guns of smaller calibre. With regard to batteries, they were nearly all formed before the 6½-ton gun was introduced into the service, and the general introduction of the 6½-ton gun would necessitate the complete change of the batteries. At the same time, it would be the duty of the Admiralty to supply proper and sufficient guns and batteries as occasion required. While he was on that point he should like to read to the House the Reports recently received from Admiral Elliot and Sir Henry Keppel on the subject of the Naval Reserve. They were most satisfactory and could not fail to give confidence to Members as to the present state of the force. Admiral Elliot said:—

"The inspection was entirely satisfactory in regard to the men of the Naval Reserve. Those I saw were as a rule fine active seamen, well suited to the true working of the guns with much spirit and goodwill, and showing a creditable knowledge for the amount of teaching they had respectively undergone. In every ship without exception the behaviour of the Naval Reserve was reported to be entirely satisfactory."

Sir Henry Keppel, an officer of great experience, and one who was certain to speak what he thought, said of the men of the Dedalus—

"As individuals they were fine able-bodied men, in the prime of life, and certainly superior in physique to the average of our own able seamen. Their rifle, cutlass, and great gun exercises were very creditably executed, without any noise whatever, and the men appear to have been carefully and well trained. On consulting with Commander Parsons, the gunner, and boatswain, they reported the men to be well-behaved and tractable. The gunner views the badge men as equal to our own trained men; 23 of the 42 on board are so qualified. The boatswain considers them more full of resource than our men. They are not equal to our men as leadsmen, nor would they be so smart aloft. The gunner states that notwithstanding the intervals of absence from drill the men appear to forget little of it."

Of the men in the Eagle he said—

"They were scarcely so fine a body of men as those in the Dedalus, but still contrast favourably with a similar number of able seamen from our service."

With respect to the Naval Coast Volunteers, it was intended to allow those who now composed that corps gradually to die out, in order that men qualified for that corps might enter for the Second-class Naval Reserve; so that, in point of fact, there would then be only two corps—namely, the First and Second-class Reserves. The Admiralty hoped the effect of this arrangement would be that the number of men passing from the second to the first would greatly increase. As to the new force—the Naval Volunteers—being an extension to the Navy of the movement which had proved so beneficial to the Army, already two of these corps had been established, one at London and the other at Liverpool, and the formation of one at Bristol was now talked of. The Admiralty had cheerfully allowed the drilling of these Volunteers on board the President; and it would be a matter for further consideration what arrangements should be made with regard to future enrolment which could not take place under the existing law. The law relating to the Naval Coast Volunteers was not suitable; and it would, therefore, be necessary to pass a measure to regulate enrolment in the new force. The Admiralty approached the subject with every desire to avail themselves of the proffered aid, and it was intended to nominate an officer who should put himself in communication with the gentlemen who were forming these Volunteer corps, to render them what assistance he could in the matter of organization, and advise the Admiralty on all points connected with them. It would be necessary to determine in what way the new force could be assisted with gunboats, and to consider various other questions; and his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty would, no doubt, have to submit a measure to Parliament for the purpose of organizing the Naval Volunteers. The expediency of Government assisting the training ships of the Merchant Service was discussed last Session, on the Motion of Mr. Graves, and on that occasion the First Lord deprecated the Navy undertaking to train seamen for the Merchant Service, but expressed his readiness to contribute towards any scheme devised by the shipowners in proportion to the benefit which the Navy derived, while the President of the Board of Trade pointed out how a fund could be obtained from the contributions made by shipowners to the Mercantile Marine Fund, and invited the co-operation of the shipowners in the organization of a scheme; his right hon. Friend, however, the President of the Board of Trade had taken means to ascertain the views of the shipowners of the country, but he had not found a disposition on their part to contribute to the establishment of training ships for the Merchant Service. Of course the House would not expect the Admiralty to put a Vote on the Estimates to meet the cost of training boys for the Merchant Service. When the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) spoke of the loud demand there was on the part of shipowners for trained apprentices, he could not help inquiring where were the shipowners—Members of the House—while the discussion was going on. One who had been present (Mr. Alderman Lusk) had objected to the scheme of the hon. Member for Northumberland, and he now noticed but one other shipowner in his seat (Mr. Bates). The Admiralty had done what they could towards improving the First and Second Classes of the Naval Reserve, and he hoped the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey) would be satisfied with what they had done and were doing, and with what they indicated as their policy for the future, and would not therefore press his Amendment.

MR. BATES said, as he had been pointedly mentioned by the hon. Member who had just sat down as a shipowner who had not spoken on the subject before the House, he would not remain altogether silent. It was said that there was not sufficient room in the ships for boys. He ventured, however, to suggest where it could be found. There were several old ships belonging to the Navy. Let one be adapted for the reception of boys at every port, under the direction of half-pay naval officers. Besides these old ships there was a large quantity of stores fit for nothing else. If we employed these old ships in the training of boys we should do away with the necessity of spending a large amount annually in repairing them at a cost above what they were worth when they were so repaired. In this way we should be able to maintain Reserves at little or no cost to the country.

MR. BRASSEY said, after the explanations and promises which had been given, he would not press his Motion.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HENRY LENNOX rose to call attention to the case of Her Majesty's

Ship Devastation. The noble Lord said, that that morning he had the pleasure of attending a very interesting meeting at the opening of the session of the College of Naval Architects, and there his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) stated that to-night he (Lord Henry Lennox) was to do battle with the right hon. Gentleman opposite in regard to this ship. His right hon. Friend, though right in nine cases out of ten, was wrong on this occasion. He had no intention of doing battle with the right hon. Gentleman. His object was merely to describe the history of the ship up to the present time, and to draw the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to unfavourable rumours which were afloat in regard to her; and no one would rejoice more than he should if the First Lord were able to tell the House and the country of the successful completion of what, when designed, was described as the most perfect type of a ship of war. He had no previous convictions to rescind and no recorded words to explain away about the Devastation, nor did he entertain any feeling amounting to panic as to the danger she would encounter at sea; but he brought the subject under the notice of the House, because in naval circles and among the public out of doors there was a feeling of disquietude respecting this vessel. On every possible opportunity distinguished officers had expressed their disapproval of a ship of this character being sent to sea, relying only on her steam power, and having no masts and sails. It was, however, from no feeling of hostility to the type of vessel, and still less from any fear as to its ultimate success, that he called the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the present condition of the Devastation. He should wish to remind hon. Members who had not deeply considered this subject that the question of mastless ships was by no means a new one. In the course of last autumn some striking letters on the subject had appeared in the leviathan organ of the day from the late Chief Constructor of the Navy (Mr. Reed), in which he stated that as long ago as 1866-7 he had proposed the construction of a gigantic mastless turret ship to the then Conservative Government, and he appeared to think rather hardly of the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) for not having carried out his design. That right hon. Gentleman was not now present, otherwise he would have been able to confirm him in stating that the design referred to by the late Chief Constructor had received the most careful attention at the Admiralty, and that the right hon. Gentleman and the majority of the Board had fully recognized in it the type of the fighting ship of the future. The cause of the right hon. Gentleman in refusing to build an experimental ship of that magnitude was justified by the course which had been followed by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). While acknowledging the merits of mastless ships he declined to make an experiment on such a gigantic scale, and asked the Constructor's Department to prepare a design of a ship of the kind of about 3,000 or 3,500 tons. Afterwards the right hon. Gentleman, convinced that something must be done in that direction, sanctioned the Devastation, which was about 4,400 tons burden. Another reason why the Conservative Administration had not thought fit to enter on such a gigantic experiment was that all new iron-clad ships of war were more or less compromises. Nothing like a perfect fighting machine had then been added to our Navy. Every care had to be taken to preserve the special cruising qualities of our ships, while their "all-round fire" had to a large extent been sacrificed, as was the case even in our two turret ships, the Monarch and the Captain. Meanwhile, while every endeavour was being made to preserve the cruising qualifications of our ironclads, the great artillery authorities had been making such great progress, and the weight of the guns had so largely increased that the constructive Department of the Navy became convinced that the time had come when they must devise some fighting machine with thicker armour and capable of carrying heavier guns. It was evident that the only system that would enable this view to be carried out was the turret system. The Devastation was, consequently, approved by the right hon. Member for Pontefract; but he did not approve of it entirely on his own judgment or on the judgment of its purely professional designer, the Chief Constructor. Sir Sydney Dacres, in contrasting the turret ships the Monarch and the Captain with the Devastation, had stated that the masts of the former vessels would never save their crews in a gale of wind, or enable them to work off a lee shore in the event of their machinery breaking down. The design of the Devastation was submitted to a Committee consisting of the late Captain Coles, Sir Joseph Whitworth, Lord Lauderdale, and another competent gentleman, who came to the conclusion that a heavily plated armoured vessel with a low freeboard was capable of crossing the Atlantic. And this brought him to the point which he desired to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman opposite, as it lay at the bottom of the controversy on the subject which was now going on. The Committee at the Admiralty reported that the low freeboard was the one way of saving weight so as to enable a very heavy armour to be carried with safety; but they did not praise a low freeboard of itself as against a high freeboard in a sea-going vessel. On the contrary, Mr. Reed had stated that if he were to design another Devastation, he should propose to build a vessel of a far larger size in order to enable her to have a higher freeboard than the vessel in question possessed. The right hon. Member for Pontefract had stated that this vessel was not intended to be used solely as a coast defence, but that she was built as a sea-going ship. It appeared to him, under these circumstances, that two points should be clearly kept in view. In the first place, there should be no increase of weight on the ship, so as to increase her immersion below the load line for which she was designed; and, secondly, that if she was to cross the Atlantic, and trust to her steaming powers, under no circumstances ought there to be any decrease of that coal-carrying power which was so vital to her safety. The right hon. Member for Pontefract had told the House on a previous occasion that the coal-carrying capacity of the Devastation would be 1,750 tons, sufficient for steaming for 10 days. That was given by the right hon. Gentleman as the cardinal reason why he recommended this type of ship to be built; and the questions he should conclude by asking the First Lord of the Admiralty were, whether these weights which had been placed on the Devastation since she was designed had necessitated an increased immersion, and a decrease in the amount of coal-carrying power. After this Commission sat at the

and he regretted that the subjects discussed were passed over with such very slight notice as they had received. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) said that he was going to reduce the personnel of the Navy by 500 boys: but he made no allusion to the great questions affecting the position of our seamen. They had in the naval service a body of men who had never been excelled in point of character or efficiency during the whole period of the naval supremacy of this country: but there was one fact in reference to the men which deserved more than a passing allusion—he referred to the prevalence of crime in the Navy. He found that out of the number of men borne on the books of the Navy no fewer than 1,700 men had been subjected to penal punishment, principally arising from leave-breaking. The offence of leave-breaking arose from causes which might be easily remedied if our ships were made more the homes of the men than they were at present. Very frequently during the 16 years he had sat in that House he had urged on the Government the necessity of establishing naval barracks: but he nevertheless found that the crew of the Decastation were at this moment quartered in a hulk, while the Marines of the Fleet were lodged in most magnificent barracks. How could they expect properly to maintain discipline in the Navy if the men were subjected to the privations and degradation of living in a miserable manner on board a hulk? The question of naval barracks had for some time been under the serious consideration of the Commander in Chief of the Navy and some of the best officers of the service, as well as the establishment of canteens on board Her Majesty's ships on Home stations and in harbours. It had also been recommended that receiving ships for men under penal discipline should be established as a better means of reclaiming them from the bad habits they had contracted, and at the same time continuing them under naval discipline. The system of canteens in Her Majesty's ships on the Home stations and in harbour might be easily adopted, and under it the men would be enabled to procure these small luxuries and comforts which would endear their ships to them, and make them consider them homes instead of prisons. He might mention how this subject of canteens had been dealt with in particular instances, and with what result. In the Coastguard ship at Liverpool the amount of crime for leave-breaking had been very considerable. The captain, one of the most judicious officers in the service, established a system on board by which his men were permitted to have a canteen placed in charge of the petty officers, and under the control of the captain. The men were allowed to have a pint of beer a-piece in the course of every evening, and the consequence was, that when they found they could obtain the comfort which any common labourer could procure in the public-house, leave-breaking came entirely to an end. Moreover, the small profit that resulted from the sale of the articles consumed had been devoted to charitable purposes. The widow of a drowned shipmate had been relieved therefrom, and other acts of charity had been dispensed from a fund that was under the control and direction of the men. The saving of provisions realized a profit to the Government of £28,000, but it was nowhere to be found in the Navy Estimates. This involved a matter of great importance to the well-being of the Navy and the health of the men.

MR. SAMUDA rose to Order, and asked the Speaker whether this subject could be discussed on the Motion before the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is that I do now leave Chair in order that the House may go into Committee of Supply. The hon. and gallant Member is within his right in making the observations which he has just been submitting to the House.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, there was another point to which he wished to refer, and that was the irregularity of the meals. In 1859 he served on the Naval Commission, and brought before it, as strongly as he could, the fact that the diet of their seamen was such as they would not subject any man or beast in their possession to; and he carried the views of the Commissioners with him. A man to be in a proper condition for work ought to be fed every five hours. At present they had a breakfast at 8 o'clock, consisting of cocoa and biscuits; dinner, with meat, at 12; cocoa and biscuit again at 5 o'clock p.m.; and from that hour till 8 o'clock next morning no food entered the mouth of the British seaman. When he was in the service the men always got a good supper. This was a matter which ought to enter into the arrangements of the Admiralty. They had established a University at Greenwich which was not likely to fare much better in the long run than the proposed University at Dublin. In appropriating the funds of Greenwich Hospital the rights and interests of those to whom the funds of the charity ought to have been devoted had been overlooked.

MR. SPEAKER said, the remarks now made by the hon. and gallant Baronet would be more in Order if he reserved them until the occasion when the Vote connected with Greenwich Hospital was about to be considered in Committee.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE observed that an engagement had been entered into by the First Lord of the Admiralty that on the second Vote general questions connected with the naval policy of the country might be discussed, and if hon. Members were not able to do so on the present occasion it would be impossible to discuss that policy.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the understanding was that in Committee on the second Vote a general discussion should be taken, and he thought it would be more convenient to enter into the matter to which his hon. and gallant Friend was referring when that Vote came before the Committee.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he should confine his remarks to the Devastation. He submitted that she was totally incapable of a sea voyage. He came to this conclusion after a personal inspection of her, and was confirmed in it by the opinion of competent men. She might be useful as an addition to the Navy for harbour defence, but she ought never to go beyond the limits of any harbour, and if she did so he should not like to be responsible for the result. This was one of the most audacious experiments in hydro-dynamics which had ever been attempted. The stern being open she would be quite helpless in the trough of the sea, and nothing short of a miracle would save her from overwhelming. He would defer any further observations which he had to make until the time when the understanding which had been referred to could be carried out.

MR. SAMUDA observed that the question before the House was not one involving the goodness of the Devastation herself. The complaint was as to the changes which had been made in the original design. It appeared to him that these had all gone in increasing the seaworthy qualities of the ship. When the vessel was originally proposed she appeared to him to be likely to possess the qualities which he had been seeking to obtain, and to induce the Admiralty to adopt. But it also appeared to him that there were certain deficiencies, which he took the liberty of pointing out. He supported the proposal to build the Devastation because he believed it was a step in the right direction so far as regarded the carrying of the armament. He knew the additional buoyancy she would need could be added, and it was added; so that the disquiet in the public mind resulting from the loss of the Captain was removed. Still he could not regard the Devastation as the ship of the future. Every step that had been taken by the Admiralty in this matter had been in the right direction, and he only regretted that they had not thought fit to go further, for he considered that a great error had been committed in not dealing with the stern of the vessel in the same way as they had treated the bows, and in not continuing the superstructure right fore and aft. Speaking from his own experience, and on a matter of every-day observation, he must say that he did not think that there was the slightest ground of apprehension as to her buoyancy even under the most adverse circumstances; and he regarded the apprehensions of the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir James Elphinstone), with reference to that vessel as being without foundation.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, that the hon. Member who had just sat down had stated that the building of the Devastation was a step in the right direction, but he wanted to know what the right direction was, and for what purpose this vessel had been built. Everyone must admit that the Devastation could not be regarded as a sea-going ship. Without going into all the reasons which showed that she could not be regarded as a sea-going ship, and without alleging that she could not live in bad weather, he maintained that she could not be employed as an ordinary sea-going cruiser. On the other hand, if she was to be employed for home defence, much more useful vessels, drawing far less water, might have been built for half her cost. He trusted that as the Devastation was unfit for a sea-going cruiser, and on account of her draught of water was equally unfit for home defence, the House would hear from the First Lord of the Admiralty that he did not intend to persevere in building experimental ships of this character. He was not in the habit of charging the Admiralty with extravagance—if it was his fate, on the contrary, to blame them generally for mistaken parsimony—but he could not help characterizing the building of this vessel, which was useless for foreign service or home defence, as a wasteful expenditure of public money.

ADMIRAL EGERTON said, that argument of the hon. Member opposite would condemn not only the Devastation but also all the iron-clads which they at present possessed.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he condemned all those of our iron-clads which could not be handled under canvas.

ADMIRAL EGERTON said, that none of our iron-clads could be handled under canvas with the same freedom as our wooden vessels were, and, in fact, it could scarcely be said of any of them that they were navigable under canvas. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member that the Devastation could not be regarded as a sea-going cruiser, because she would require to burn coals all the time she was at sea, which would render it impossible for her to cruise for any length of time without going into port to re-coal. As he understood the design of the Devastation when it was proposed, she was intended to cross the Atlantic if necessary, and, having fought a battle, to return to this country or to some other port, where she could re-coal, but she was not intended to keep the sea as a cruiser. In his opinion she would prove an efficient ship, and capable of realizing the objects for which she was constructed. He hoped that the time would come when we could revert to our unarmoured ships, but until then he thought the Admiralty were wise in building ships of this character.

MR. GOSCHEN said he was much obliged to his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Admiral Egerton) for the few words he had just uttered in regard to the Devastation. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) was rather in the habit of thinking that all naval opinion was on his side, and that the Admiralty was proceeding in the face of all naval authority. Now, speaking on behalf of the Board of Admiralty, he (Mr. Goschen) would inform him that he was surrounded by naval officers of the highest ability and experience, whose advice he felt bound to take on those matters. He was fortified by those opinions in saying he believed that the Devastation would answer all the expectations respecting her. No ship had ever been submitted to a more searching investigation than the Devastation. When, then, the hon. Gentleman said that she would never answer as a sea-going ship, he could tell him that his opinion was completely opposed to the opinions of the most eminent naval officers who had been consulted by the Admiralty. He was glad, therefore, that his hon. and gallant Friend (Admiral Egerton) had protested against the use of such language. The other day the hon. Member for West Norfolk asked whether the Admiralty had ever considered the power of guns in piercing armour-plates. Why, from day to day they thought of hardly anything else. The hon. Member constantly taunted the Admiralty with a want of knowledge of such subjects as this; but he (Mr. Goschen) was bound to say in all courtesy that the hon. Gentleman was wholly ignorant of the way in which those questions were treated by the Naval Department of the Government. The hon. Member asked with what intention this ship had been designed. It was a fair question, and he knew no better mode of answering it than by reading a paper from the pen of Sir Spencer Robinson, which was in the hands of Members—

"The first object to be aimed at in a ship of war is the power of destroying the enemy. Modern naval warfare shows that there are two distinct powers of destruction in fleets or ships, the power of artillery and the power of impact; the latter abundantly difficult to use, but fearfully efficacious; the former easier to handle, but not so instantaneous in its effects. For neither of these purposes is excessive speed continued for many days a first or necessary condition; on the contrary, high speed continued for several days necessitates the use of forms and the appropriation of weights which, in the first case, are unfavourable to manœuvring; and, in the second case, limit the power of artillery; the former rendering almost unavailable the tremendous power lodged in the ship herself, and developed by impact, the latter giving at once in battle the superiority to the more heavily-armed ship. No great naval battle will be fought at very high speeds. Two fleets meeting each other, however anxious both sides may be to fight it out, will find it necessary to keep together and manœuvre with precision; this will not be done at extreme speeds. The great maritime Powers with whom alone we should enter on a contest for life and death would be France and Russia. A war with America would be of so different a nature that the Navy required for that purpose is altogether a thing apart; but if we have to contend for great national purposes with either France or Russia the contest must be in European waters; the Channel, the Mediterranean, or the Baltic will be the scenes of strifes fearful to contemplate. It is for us of vital importance to come triumphant out of such a contest. We shall neither need extreme speed, nor the power of steaming for many days in succession at a high rate, to insure a victory. What we shall want, above all things, is the means of carrying and defending a formidable artillery, combined with the greatest facility in making use of the power of impact. To these two requirements all others must be subordinate; in their perfection they will hardly be found in the same ship, but whether these two destructive forces are in one and the same ship or not, a large amount of defence is necessary to enable any use at all to be made of either offensive power. English ships' sides must be difficult to penetrate; engines and boilers must be protected from the explosion of shells; magazines must have some security, if in an artillery combat with France or Russia we are to contend at least on equal terms. If their ships carry heavy armour, so must ours, and that position is, I conceive, irrefutable, though we may admit that no perfect protection against even the guns carried at sea can, in all cases, be had. And if that position is true as to an artillery fight, it is even more true of the other great means by which naval actions will be decided, namely, the impact of one ship against another. The ship that intends to give that deadly blow must be so defended by shot-resisting sides and decks, as to bear with comparative impunity much pounding from heavy guns before she finds an opportunity of delivering her fatal and final thrust. Heavy guns (and the Devastation is armed with 35-ton guns), thick armour (her armour is 12-inches thick), great handiness (and the Devastation can turn with the greatest ease)—are the first qualities for ships that have to fight in fleets. When these are secured, add the greatest speed that can be obtained, coal enough to provide for the necessities of warfare in the Channel, Mediterranean, or Baltic, such sea-going qualities as will enable operations in these seas to be performed with safety, good arrangements for officers and men, and as little sail power as is consistent with the use to be made of a fleet in time of peace. This, in my opinion, is the kind of fleet without which England could not hope to fight a naval action with success, without which a maritime war with a Great Power would be our destruction; and it this fleet whose numbers, I think, it is our bounden duty to complete, before undertaking vessels of another type, valuable as they may be, or desirable as it may be to have them as soon as our more imperious wants are satisfied."

LORD HENRY LENNOX asked whether these remarks referred to the Devastation type of vessel?

MR. GÖSCHEN said, he would read on—

"I therefore urge as strongly as I can that the type of ship necessary for fleet fighting be taken up as the one most required; that our new constructions may be of the nature of the Glatton or Hotspur."

[LORD HENRY LENNOX: Hear, hear!] And this was the paper on which Sir Spencer Robinson recommended the building of the Devastation. Did the noble Lord dispute that proposition?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he could not dispute it, not having the paper before him; but his impression was that the paper referred to masted and rigged ships; otherwise, why the reference to "as little sail power as" possible?

MR. GÖSCHEN said, that nevertheless the noble Lord cried "Hear, hear" when he mentioned the Glatton and the Hotspur, which had neither. He had read this extract to show that the Devastation was meant for fleet fighting—to fight the great naval battles of the future. Such a ship must have sufficient coal-carrying and sea-going qualities to fight in the Baltic, the Mediterranean, the North Sea, and the Channel; and, though this was not stated in the Minute, she must also be able to cross the Atlantic in safety, and fight an action on that side of the water if necessary. He said distinctly that if the sea-going qualities of the Devastation should turn out a failure, the Devastation herself would be a failure; and he acknowledged that if she were simply a ship for coast defence, we could build cheaper ships, and ships better adapted to that purpose. It was, however, as sea-going fighting ships that the Admiralty attached importance to vessels of the Devastation type; they were not to prey upon the enemy's commerce, because ships of another type would be used for that purpose; they were to cope at sea with the fighting ships of other Powers. He would now address himself to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester—a speech of great moderation, and which put the case very plainly. He was glad the noble Lord did not introduce the question of personal responsibility, upon which so much had been said. The original designers were relieved from responsibility on account of the changes which had been made in the ship; but, as had been stated elsewhere, the responsibility rested with those who sent the ship to sea, and with the naval architects who advised that she was a ship which might be sent to sea. He was glad to think that these personal discussions might now be looked upon as ended. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) was subjected to much attack in his absence, having no opportunity of replying, but they might now assume that such charges would not be repeated. The noble Lord fairly said that the main point raised by the changes in the Devastation was her coal-carrying power; and he asked whether the ship would be further immersed, and would carry less coal than she was designed to carry. As the final calculations were not yet made, he could not tell to within 50 or 100 tons how the weights would turn out; but before the Committee of Designs sat certain increases had already been made in the weight of the ship. Her armaments had been raised from four 25-ton to four 35-ton guns, increasing her weight by 157 tons. There was also an increase of 155 tons through the thickening of the armour deck; the little iron mast that was added weighed 20 tons; the conning tower was added, weighing 97 tons; and the engine would weigh 35 tons more than was expected, though this was a matter over which the Admiralty had no control. The Committee of Designs recommended some further changes. The design for the superstructure was placed before them in January, 1871, and this added 133 tons to the weight. The Committee recommended an important addition—bulkheads of thick armour to protect the "vitals" of the ship from a raking fire fore and aft; and the naval and scientific men upon the Committee stated that the fighting efficiency of the ship would be enormously increased by such a protection. These bulkheads represented a further addition of 134 tons. It was resolved further to subdivide the compartments at the bow, in order to give additional buoyancy in case that part of the ship were struck, and the additional iron plating there increased the weight by 13 tons. The thickening of the deck-plates was to protect the magazines and the ship generally from the explosion of shells. Her fighting powers had accordingly been greatly increased, and the noble Lord asked at what sacrifice had those fighting powers been increased? The noble Lord asked, in the first place, whether they had been increased at the expense of the sea-going qualities of the ship. Now, her sea-going qualities had not been sacrificed, but had been improved. He wished to lay particular stress on that point. If those additional weights had been put into the ship without any difference in her form, they would have raised the centre of gravity; but while the centre of gravity had been raised by those additional weights, the superstructure had had a counterbalancing and more than counterbalancing influence in increasing the range of stability of the ship; and the consequence had been that notwithstanding that increased weight, the angle of stability had been increased from 44, at which it stood in the original design, to 56. It had been stated that night that the Committee of Designs were satisfied with 43; but in their last Report they said they would prefer 50, and 56 had been given in the case of the Devastation. The noble Lord next alluded to what he called the surplus of displacement; but the noble Lord used that term in one sense, and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) used it in another. The noble Lord, in speaking of the surplus of displacement, meant simply whether she would float lower than her designed line of draught or not. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets spoke of it as displacement above water. [Mr. SAMUDA: I meant surplus buoyancy.] He wished rather for the sake of the public to correct the noble Lord, and to point out what the surplus of displacement really was. By the various changes that had been made additional weights had been put into the ship, which could not be calculated to a ton, but they ranged between 400 and 500 tons. That was the additional weight after increasing her stability, increasing the comfort of the men, and, above all, increasing her fighting qualities. How were they to deal with that extra 400 or 500 tons? Was the ship to be immersed so much more, or was her coal supply to be reduced, or was she to be partly immersed some few inches more, and partly to have her supply of coal reduced?

Now, one most gratifying circumstance had come to their aid in that respect, because at the same time that they had increased the fighting powers of the ship they had been able to reduce her coal-carrying capacity without diminishing materially the distance she could go; and for this reason. Fortunately, the machinery, the engines, and boilers of the ship had turned out to be so successful that with 1,400 tons of coal on board they could steam a longer distance than they could have done with the 1,600 tons which they originally estimated. Therefore 200 tons could be removed without in the least interfering with the distance which she could proceed. Mr. Reed made a calculation which was submitted to Lord Lauderdale's Committee. He showed that with 1,600 tons of coal on board, the Devastation could steam 5,600 miles at six knots speed, 4,320 miles at ten knots, and 2,880 miles at 12 knots. The results of the latest trials showed that they could steam with 1,400 tons of coal 6,650 miles at six knots, 4,580 miles at 10 knots, and 2,890 miles at 12 knots. So that the Devastation, with 200 tons less coal-carrying capacity—if they decided in that direction—could go a longer distance than she had been estimated to go, and those 200 tons could be removed from the ship. But, further, her coal might be reduced to 1,200 tons, and she could still steam 5,700 miles at six knots, or 100 knots more than she was estimated to go with 1,600 tons. They had secured greater stability, greater safety for the men, and infinitely better protection against fore and aft raking fire. They had carried out further improvements in the ship, thickened the armour decks, and they were also able to go a greater distance with a smaller quantity of coal than she was estimated to go with a larger quantity. He would point out that supposing the ship was immersed six inches more, 200 tons would represent about that amount of additional immersion. Moreover, those 200 tons of coal would be consumed in the very first days of the Devastation proceeding to sea; and it should never be forgotten that the deeper immersion would occur only during the first days of proceeding to sea. His case, therefore, in reply to the noble Lord was very simple. They had secured additional fighting power for the ship, they had in consequence increased the weights; but they were able to relieve those weights by diminishing the supply of coal which she would carry, and that without reducing the distance she could go. But, more than that, the constructors believed that it would be no damage to the ship if she was immersed those few additional inches. They would make trials at various draught lines, they would see at what draught line she was safest, and regulate her accordingly. The constructors believed that, besides those improvements in the ship, they would have the advantage of greater engine power, and that she would be able to carry from 1,500 to 1,600 tons of coal without at all imperilling her. It ought to be understood, both in the House and out of doors, that it was not a question of safety, but of the amount of coal which the Devastation could carry. He could not conclude better than by again quoting the words of Sir Spencer Robinson, who said—

"Extend, therefore, the turret and the ram system as much as possible on moderate dimensions, make such vessels truly formidable fighting ships, sacrificing to some extent the showy and attractive qualities of excessive speed and large coal power for superior fighting powers."

The Admiralty did not think that they had sacrificed the fighting power, because the Devastation would have such powers of fighting as no ship had had before.

SIR JOHN HAY said, there were two questions which fairly came within the purview of that debate, namely, whether the Devastation now produced was the Devastation that was designed; and whether the Devastation was a type of ship which it was desirable to reproduce. He had concurred with his lamented friend (Mr. Corry) in thinking the expenditure upon the Devastation was not justified; that for coast defence the ship was too large and drew too much water; while for sea-going purposes a ship of that character was not what the country required. Having, however, been built, it was very desirable to ascertain whether she was such a vessel as the designer had intended. As to her coal-carrying capacity, he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) had not satisfied the House that the ship was what she was intended to be. The right hon. Gentleman had given them evidence that she would be considerably beyond her draught, that draught being excessive as it was, if the whole of the coal was put in her. What the right hon. Gentleman had stated about the power of her engines might be very creditable to her engine-makers; but it would not convince those who had considered the question that the result of the changes made in her had not altered that which she was originally designed to be. No doubt in building an ironclad ship everything must be in the nature of a compromise; it was impossible to have an ironclad ship perfect in every particular; something must be sacrificed to obtain benefit in another direction. But a sea-going man-of-war ought to have two qualities; she should be seaworthy, and she should also be able to keep the sea. These two things were different. Seaworthiness depended upon an adequate proportion and just distribution of the weight, and also upon good workmanship and material, which last were always obtained, whether in the dockyards or private yards. To keep the sea required sufficient and healthy accommodation for the crew, inexhaustible means of conducting the ship, which pointed to sails, and sufficient space for armament and accessories. He thought that the Devastation and her sister ships were not complete in these particulars, and he objected to further expenditure upon this kind of ship until full experiment had been made. Another qualification necessary was great speed with handiness, enabling a ship to choose the time for attack, to chase and overtake the enemy, and to escape from a superior force. As the supreme effort would be made under steam, there must be some sacrifice of sail for the sake of the greatest velocity under steam. The draught should also be as light as possible consistent with other qualifications, and though the Devastation had been spoken of for service in the Baltic, a vessel of her draught could not approach any of the great Russian fortifications. The draught of the Suez Canal should be considered, for to a maritime country which might be engaged in hostilities in the East or in the West, it was important to avoid the circuit of Africa. Other places where men-of-war might have to act were nearly identical, such as the River St. Lawrence. As to armour, a sea-going and seaworthy ship could only be protected in certain places, for though 10 years ago it could be entirely clothed above the water line with armour sufficient to resist the artillery then existing, the rough rule being an inch additional armour for every 1,000 tons, ironplate had now to be as thick as the diameter of the gun fired against it. There being guns 16 inches in diameter, 16 inch plates were necessary to resist them, but nobody would think of building a 16,000 ton vessel with 16 inch plates. Moreover, the ram and torpedo were more dangerous than shot and shell, and it was impossible to clothe a vessel below water with armour sufficient to resist these. It must, therefore, be considered what parts should be protected. He had had the honour of knowing Admiral Tegethoff, the distinguished commander who had fought the only great battle in which ramming and turret ships had taken part, and he justified the the unfortunate position of his antagonist Admiral Persano's low free-board turret ship by saying it was so unmanageable in the sea then on that its Admiral could not take the part he was anxious for. Admiral Tegethoff had a wooden ship slightly protected with armour, and it sank a vessel with 600 or 700 hands by striking it amidships with its ram. The greatest damage was sustained by vessels with armour just thick enough to detain the shells, causing explosions in places where they should not have happened. The result of that action ought to teach us that there was no advantage in having unmasted, unseaworthy turret ships, especially now that we could not coat the whole of the ship with armour. The magazine ought first to be protected, then the motive power, then, as far as possible, the steering apparatus, then the machinery of the gun, and lastly, the bottom of the ship must be protected from the ram and the torpedo by cellular construction, or by some other contrivance. He thought that they must give up attempting to protect the men at the guns, and that they had much better let the shot go through those parts of the ship that were not essential. It was because the Devastation had very few of the necessary qualities that he had opposed its construction, and he should object to any further expenditure on such vessels until the Thunderer and the Devastation had proved better than he expected. As to coal-carrying capacity, the latitude and longitude in which a vessel might be required could not be fixed. When the Devastation had consumed half of her coal she would have to come back for a supply of coal. Therefore, only half of her power could be used for offensive purposes; the other half would be required to bring her back. Nothing could be more annoying to a naval officer who went to sea with such a ship, than to find that instead of proceeding to fight the enemy he must go back for more coal. For this reason, all men-of-war must be in the nature of a compromise, but the compromise by which sails were sacrificed entirely was a mistaken one. To make vessels drawing so large an amount of water dependent upon one motive power was bad policy, and, holding that opinion, he should oppose any increase in the number of these ships.

MR. G. BENTINCK said the First Lord of the Admiralty was mistaken in supposing that he had asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had considered the question of ships and guns. He had referred to armour plate versus guns.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the right hon. Gentleman took him up rather sharply because he cheered when the Hotspur and the Glatton were mentioned. The explanation of his cheer was this—the Hotspur and the Glatton were intended for the Mediterranean; whereas the Devastation was intended for the Atlantic, the West Indies, and the Cape of Good Hope. He wished to know if the Devastation was to carry 1,400 and not 1,600 tons of coal, what the draught would be at 1,400 tons of coal?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had already informed the noble Lord that the Admiralty had not got the final calculations. He had stated that, with 1,400 tons of coals, she could go further than if she carried 1,600 tons of coals, and that she would be tried under various conditions, and her supply of coal would be limited accordingly.

LORD HENRY SCOTT, who had given Notice that he would call attention to the Report of the Committee of Designs on Ships of War, asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he should bring forward that subject now or defer it till the Dockyard Vote came before the Committee of Supply?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought it would be far better to postpone the subject until the Dockyard Vote came on.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,035,719, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Victuals and Clothing for Seamen and Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874."

MR. GOSCHEN observed that some hon. Members might wish to have a lengthy discussion on this Vote, and as other Business had to be disposed of that evening, he thought the best course would be at once to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Goschen.)

In reply to MR. RYLANDS,

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would bring forward the Navy Estimates again whenever he had an opportunity of doing so.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL [BILL 34.]

(Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Childers, Mr. Arthur Peel.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 31st March.]

Amendment [31st March] again proposed, in page 9, line 17, to leave out from the words "They may, by themselves," to the words "inspection of which appears to them requisite," in line 20 (Mr. Muntz).

Question proposed, "that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Clause 21 (Powers of Commissioners. See 34 & 35 Vict. c. 78. s. 7),

MR. MUNTZ moved, in page 9, line 26, after "document," to insert "belonging to any Railway or Canal Company, or other public Company."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he could not accept the Amendment, as there would be two parties to every case brought before the Commissioners, and it ought to be in the power of the Commissioners to compel the production of documents on both sides. The proper course would be to define the documents to be called for as those which related to the matter before the Commissioners. He would therefore move in page 9, line 26, to leave out "which they consider important," and insert "relating to the matters before them."

Amendment (Mr. Muntz) by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) agreed to.

Clause 22 (Orders of Commissioners).

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved in page 10, line 13, after "any of them," insert—

"The Commissioners may also, if they think fit, at the instance of any party to the proceedings before them, and upon such security being given by the appellant as the Commissioners may direct, state a case in writing for the opinion of any superior court upon any question which in the opinion of the Commissioners is a question of law.

"The court to which the case is transmitted shall hear and determine the question or questions of law arising thereon, and shall thereupon reverse, affirm, or amend the determination in respect of which the case has been stated, or remit the matter to the Commissioners with the opinion of the court thereon, or may make such other order in relation to the matter, and may make such order as to costs as to the court may seem fit, and all such orders shall be final and conclusive on all parties: Provided—That the Commissioners shall not be liable to any costs in respect or by reason of any such appeal.

"The operation of any order made by the Commissioners shall not be stayed pending the decision of any such appeal."

MR. LEEMAN objected to the proposal, and suggested the insertion of words which would have the effect of making it imperative on the Commissioners to grant an appeal.

MR. DENISON said, it was perfectly impossible for the Railway Companies to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and they were united and determined upon that point. Nobody knew who were to be the Commissioners, and he would not trust any three men in the kingdom with despotic powers of interpretation without any appeal unless they chose to grant it. He could not make any compromise in this matter, and Railway Companies would abnegate the duties which they owed to their shareholders if they permitted the Government to carry such clauses as this, and take their rights away from them.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the language of the hon. Gentleman was somewhat strong, and he was afraid that if Railway Companies were to come to the House with more assumption, they might not get that amount of justice to which they were entitled. On the general question it must be remembered that the individual trader had to deal with powerful Companies, holding very long purses, and that unnecessary liberty of appeal might thus place the trader practically at the mercy of the carrier. He thought, on the part of the Government, that there was a great deal in the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Mr. Cross), but they would ask the Committee to pass the clause in the shape in which it was now proposed, undertaking to consider that suggestion before the Report, and if possible to propose words in accordance with it.

MR. LEEMAN contended that the clause, by taking away the right of appeal, deprived the Companies of the right which belonged to every subject of this realm. ["No, no."] It was said that there was to be only a right of appeal if the tribunal should think fit. But the Chief Commissioner and another of the Commissioners were not to be lawyers, and while this was so there was to be no right of appeal from their decision, even on points of law. An appeal as a question of fact was not asked at all. He would appeal to the House on a matter of justice not to deprive Companies of a right of appeal.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that the right of appeal which existed in the ordinary Courts should be permitted in the case of this new tribunal also.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he thought the Railway Companies were not asking anything but justice in asking a right of appeal, especially in questions of pure law which were not complicated with matters of fact.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL remarked that there were many cases where the right of appeal depended on the leave of the Court, and there was a very large number of cases in which no right of appeal existed at all. In very many instances the amount involved would be very small, and it would be very oppressive to give a right of appeal merely because one of the parties was a great and wealthy corporation. Again, in many cases the law was perfectly well settled. There was no occasion for distrusting the proposed tribunal so far as to suppose that it would prevent the opinion of a Court of Law being taken on any question, the decision of which might be requisite for the future guidance of the tribunal itself. The question of the necessity of appeal might fairly be left to the lawyer who would be one of the Commissioners.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE agreed that the Solicitor General had stated the case very fairly, but his statement went against the Bill altogether. For his own part, he strongly objected both to the Bill and the tribunal under it. He believed the tribunal proposed would either meddle too much, and become intolerable, or be useless, and do nothing at all. The Court of Common Pleas might have been continued to act as the tribunal, if it were strengthened by assessors appointed to assist in its decisions. If, however, the new tribunal was to decide these matters, it should be made as strong as possible, which it would not be if there should be given a power of appeal to a Superior Court in all cases.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Government were of opinion that there was a great deal in the suggestion of the hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Mr. Cross), and without binding themselves to any particular words, they would introduce a provision which would make an appeal absolute in those cases in which the Commissioners were not unanimous.

Amendment amended and agreed to.

Clause 23 (Sittings of Commissioners).

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved in page 10, after line 21, to insert—

"Provided that if it appears to the President of the Board of Trade for the time being that it is expedient in the public interest that the Commissioners, or any of them, shall sit at any particular place for the discharge of any of their duties, it shall be lawful for him to give directions to that effect in writing, and the Commissioners shall act accordingly."

MR. W. H. SMITH asked what was the object of this Proviso?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Proviso was proposed in the public interest. It might be of great advantage that causes should be heard out of London, and if the Commissioners were disinclined to take that course he proposed to give the Board of Trade power to direct them to do so.

MR. DILLWYN said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have less confidence in the Commissioners than the Railway Companies.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 24 (Power of Commissioners to make general orders).

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved, in page 10, line 22, after "may," insert "with the approval of the Lord Chancellor."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved, in page 10, line 24, after "them," insert

"Including applications for and the stating of cases for appeal; also for enabling the Commissioners in cases to be specified in such general orders to exercise their jurisdiction by any one or two of their number: Provided, That any person aggrieved by any decision or order made in any case so specified, may require a rehearing by all the Commissioners."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, referring to the provision, which required certain rules to be placed before Parliament for the space of two months, expressed a hope that words would be inserted with a view of preventing difficulties similar to those which had arisen in the case of schemes proposed by the Endowed School Commissioners.

MR. F. S. POWELL suggested that the words "one month" should be omitted from the clause, and "two months" inserted.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would consider the question.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 25 to 32, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 33 (Duration of office and powers of Commissioners).

MR. STEPHEN CAVE asked how it would be possible to get men at a salary of £3,000 a-year to undertake these duties if their appointment was only for five years. It would be better not to limit the duration of the Commission, leaving Parliament free to deal with the matter. This showed the impolicy of a doubtful experiment. He did not object to a high salary, because he thought public servants were generally underpaid, but he did not like pensions, and Commissioners had a tendency to become pensioners.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had believed that he was acting in conformity with the feeling of the House. This was more or less an experiment, and he had thought it unadvisable to make the Act permanent and give the Commissioners a perpetual lease of office. He had no particular affection for the term of five years; but he still believed that the House would prefer to retain that term in the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he should like to know what sort of men the right hon. Gentleman expected to get for five years, and what he meant to do with them at the end of that time. Was the lawyer-member to go back to his profession, and did the right hon. Gentleman expect to get the right sort of railway-member for £3,000 a-year, if at the end of that time he was to be turned adrift?

MR. RATHBONE agreed that it would be more desirable to give salaries of £5,000 than £3,000. The success of this Bill would very much depend on the way it was worked. If the Commissioners made their offices useless or pernicious, they must take the consequences. If, on the contrary, they did their duty well, it was most likely their appointments would be permanent.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he thought that few good men would give up a position for another of only three years.

MR. WOODS said, the Committee could not do better than accept the proposition of the Government. The statement made by the President of the Board of Trade led to the inference that able men were ready to accept the office, one being a barrister of 14 years' standing.

MR. GREGORY observed that it would be impossible if the duration of the Commission was only for five years that they could re-place any Member who happened to die at the end of three or four years.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was in favour of the clause, which, as it stood, would relieve the country from all claim to compensation in case the Bill should not prove a success.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that the Committee were in this difficulty. If they made permanent appointments they might, of course, be called upon for compensation if they abolished the Commission; if they made the appointments for five years only, they ran the risk of not getting the best men. The Government would have to choose between two evils, and he wished them joy of the choice.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was at a loss to know who would accept the duties. A barrister of 14 years' standing with anything like talent and energy would make more money by his profession than the salary proposed to be given.

MR. MONK said, the tribunal should be such as would command the confidence of the public. The Committee ought to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Mr. Cross).

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, there would be no difficulty in finding competent men. It was not salary alone that guided men in accepting offices of this kind, but positions of credit and importance.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE suggested that perhaps the appointments were already made.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 29; Majority 104.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved a new clause giving the Board of Trade power from time to time to appoint not more than two Assistant Commissioners.

New Clause (Duties of Assistant Commissioner).—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue,) —brought up, and read the first time.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH said, he thought it would be far better to empower the Commissioners, with the sanction of the Treasury, to appoint the Assistant Commissioners, and at the proper time he would move to leave out the words "Board of Trade," and insert the word "Commissioners."

MR. HEYGATE said, he would take the sense of the Committee upon the proposed clause.

Mr. Stephen Cave

MR. PEASE looked upon the Assistant Commissioners as a very important part of the whole system, inasmuch as it would be impossible for the Commissioners to perform the whole of the duties.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had not the slightest wish to retain the patronage of the appointments in question in the hands of the Board of Trade, and should be very willing that the Assistant Commissioners should be appointed by the Commissioners with the approval of the Treasury; but he would consider before the Report the best mode of appointing them. He would also propose the insertion in the clause of words permitting the Assistant Commissioners to undertake arbitrations under the Act with the assent of both parties.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 126; Noes 27: Majority 99.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. RATHBONE moved, after Clause 10, to insert the following clause:—(Provision for complaint by public authority in certain cases).

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "or by not less than ten inhabitant traders."—(Mr. Childers.)

Question put, "That the words 'or by not less than ten' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 98: Majority 55.

MR. GREGORY moved the following clause:—(Commissioners to report upon rates under Bills for amalgamation or traffic arrangements).

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought it would be unwise to throw such functions—at all events, without further consideration—on the Commissioners.

Clause negatived.

MR. GREGORY moved the following clause:—(Power to Commissioners to fix terminal charges).

New Clause—(Mr. Gregory.)—brought up, and read the first time.

MR. CHILDERS opposed the clause, on the ground that it was utterly alien to the general objects and scope of the Bill.

Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 81; Noes 51: Majority 30.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 121.]

UNIVERSITY TESTS (DUBLIN) (NO. 3)

BILL.

Adjourned Debate on Question [2nd April], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," for Committee to consider the abolition of Tests in Trinity College and the University of Dublin. Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish Tests in Trinity College and the University of Dublin.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. FAWCETT, Dr. LYON PLAYFAIR, Mr. PLUNKET, and Viscount CRICHTON.

BASTARDY LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

The Earl of Salisbury.

Commons' Amendments considered.

On the Order of the Day for considering Commons' Amendments to Lords' Amendments and Commons' Reasons for Disagreeing to some of the Amendments made by the Lords.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, their Lordships would recollect that when this Bill came up from the Commons it was found that there were several blunders in it and also that much intricacy and confusion were created by the reference which the Bill contained to Acts of Parliament some of which had been repealed. Their Lordships not only removed the blunders but simplified the excessively long by making the Bill one of consolidation. In that state the Bill went down to the Commons. It appeared now that the Commons accepted the removal of the blunders but refused to accept the consolidation. He understood that this refusal was at the instance of the Local Government Board, and that it was based on the allegation that the Board itself intended at some future day to bring in a Consolidation Bill. He must say that he thought there was much to be said in the practice of the Government allowing subjects of this kind to be dealt with in Bills brought in by private Members. The Government ought to take the full responsibility of such Bills, and that as Parliament would have some security that they were properly drawn. The Government said consolidation in this subject was necessary, and when they got a consolidated Bill they refused to accept it. Under the system of passing partial measures while waiting for consolidation there was a complete interruption of legislation. Nothing is done, the subject existing in a state of confusion and being promised to be dealt with at a future day. He was not prepared to say that the Government were not doing all that was possible, but he thought that the Government had been wanting in proper consideration of the subject. He thought that the Government were not doing all that was possible, but he thought that the Government had been wanting in proper consideration of the subject. He thought that the Government were not doing all that was possible, but he thought that the Government had been wanting in proper consideration of the subject.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he did not understand what the noble Marquess would have the Government do. Were they to say that there was to be no legislation on any subject until they could have a general consolidation of all the law relating to that subject?—because, if that were so, all legislation would have to be suspended for a considerable time. The case of the Merchant Shipping Acts was an example of the exceeding difficulty attending this kind of legislation. A consolidation of the laws relating to this subject had been under consideration for some years, and he would ask, ought Parliament to defer dealing with the evils to which Mr. Parnell had called attention until a consolidation of these Acts could be effected? If they did so, how many lives might be lost in the meantime? He quite concurred with the noble Marquess that consolidation was desirable—against that proposition he had not a word to say, but though it sounded exceedingly well to say, "We must have a Consolidation Bill" in all occasions when it was proposed to remedy pressing evils, the thing was impracticable. The Government would surely be held responsible for the Bill. It had been introduced in the other House by an hon. Member who did not usually support them, but he had yet to learn that it was the duty of the Government to prevent the introduction of Bills by private Members. He thought it was desirable in many cases that legislation should be introduced by private Members. The merits or demerits of this particular Bill he was not competent to discuss; but if the noble Marquess with all his ability, had not been able to avoid some of the extraordinary slips which occurred in the Amendment, how infinite must it not be done in a Bill in such a manner as that a phantasmagoria was not open to the mind.

THE VISCOUNT said, it appeared to him that the noble Earl who had just spoken had very nearly missed the point raised by the noble Marquess, the Marquess of Salisbury. The noble Earl had spoken as if the noble Marquess had not made the proposition that all legislation should be suspended till there was a general consolidation dealing with the subject in which it was proposed to legislate. Now what his noble friend said was this—that a Bill had come up to that House dealing with certain portions of an Act of last year—that Bill was not only amended in their Lordships' House, but turned into one of consolidation—consolidating as it did those portions of the Act of last year which it was proposed to retain with the other provisions which would apply to bastardy cases if the Bill passed. That consolidation was rejected in the other House on the ground that at a future day a general measure of consolidation would be introduced by the Local Government Board. His noble Friend complained of this, saying that it would be better to have one statute which should contain the required changes, and all that was necessary to be retained of the Bill of last year, rather than have two statutes—that of last year and the one it was now proposed to pass.

LORD REDESDALE said, their Lordships had now before them not only the Bill as it had left their Lordship's House, but the Lords' Amendments and the Commons' Amendments and the Commons' Reasons for disagreeing from the Lords. It was difficult to find out what the shape was in which the Bill was now supposed to stand. If they were to go on to consider it as amended, they ought to have it reprinted; but what he would suggest was this—let their Lordships send their Bill back to the Commons again and say they preferred one Act to two Acts. When pains were taken in this House to make a Bill perfect the Commons objected to it because it was perfect.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that having been intrusted with the charge of the Bill in their Lordships' House, he desired to see it as perfect as possible; but as, owing to the flaw in the existing law, a great many poor women were suffering serious wrong, he would ask their Lordships not to endanger the passing of an amending Act by holding out on any point of form.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that even though he might not agree with the other House as to the point of form, he should regard it as a great evil if a necessary amendment in the law were defeated by any differences between the two Houses on a question of consolidation.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was inclined to take the same view as that put forward by his noble Friend

(the Earl of Shaftesbury) and his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. He believed the Bill had been much improved by making it a Consolidation Bill, and he thought he could show the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) that there were not the slips in the clauses which he seemed to suppose; but rather than that the flaw in the Act of last year should not be made good, he would give up the point of consolidation.

Commons' Amendments and Reasons considered accordingly.

Debate arising, the further debate adjourned to Monday the 21st instant; and Bill, with Amendments, to be printed. (No. 63.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Monday the 21st instant, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRANCE—PASSPORTS.—QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been directed to the practice of demanding passports with visas from British subjects embarking for France on French steamers at certain ports in the Mediterranean; and, whether any representations have been made to the French Government as to the inconvenience thereby entailed upon British subjects, who are accustomed to consider themselves as exempt from passport regulations when travelling through France?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the attention of the Foreign Office has been directed to the practice alluded to by the hon. Baronet, and Lord Lyons was instructed to call the attention of the French Government to the inconvenience to which English travellers were thus stated to be subjected. It appears from a Despatch received in reply from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris that Lord Lyons had already been in communication with the French Government upon the subject; and on this occasion the French Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that he had reminded the Directors of the Messageries Maritimes of the facilities accorded to English travellers in the matter of passports, and that they had been requested to give directions in order that English travellers should neither be required to produce passports on disembarking at French ports nor on taking tickets for their passage.

ARMY—TROOP HORSES (INDIA.)

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as has been stated on high authority, that a troop horse bred in the Government studs in India costs the State £205; what are the intentions of the Government with respect to the maintenance of these studs; and, whether he can lay any Papers before the House which will give any information as to their condition and management?

MR. GRANT DUFF: I am unable, Sir, to reply categorically to my hon. Friend's first Question, but the cost is certainly great, and greater than is desirable. In reply to his second Question, I have to say that the whole subject of the studs is under consideration. In reply to his third Question, I have to say that there will be no objection to produce the Correspondence if he will move for it after it is complete.

SLAVE TRADE AT ZANZIBAR.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to a statement which appeared in "The Times" newspaper, in a letter from Zanzibar of February 18th last, to the effect that many Arab slave dhows carry the French flag, not because the dhows or their cargoes are French, but because the French flag prevents their being searched by British cruisers, Whether any official Communications have been received from Sir Bartle Frere on the subject; and, if so, whether any representations have been made to the French Government?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, it is quite true that many Arab dhows carry the French flag, neither the owners, vessels, nor cargoes being French, and Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris has on several occasions been instructed to make representations to the French Government on the subject of the facilities thus afforded to native vessels for procuring French papers, which facilities are abused for Slave Trade purposes. British cruisers have no right to search French vessels; all they can do is to verify their nationality by demanding to see their papers. I believe that the new Commander of the French Naval Forces on the East African station received special instructions not to allow native vessels to obtain French papers or assume the French flag for the purposes of the Slave Trade. No special representation on this subject has been received from Sir Bartle Frere.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS-BANK ACCOUNT.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Postmaster General, If the amount due to the National Debt Commissioners up to the 31st March 1873 on the Post Office Savings Bank Account has been paid over by the Post Office to the Commissioners?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, the estimated amount due to the National Debt Commissioners up to the 31st of March, 1873—that being the last day of the quarter—on Post Office Savings-Banks accounts was £430,000, and it has all been paid.

JURIES (IRELAND) ACT, 1871—NOMINATION OF THE COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is aware or has heard that any Member nominated on the Select Committee on Juries (Ireland) Act, 1871, had been previously requested to consent to serve on such Committee by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland; whether he is aware or has heard that any Member of the said Committee was, previously to his nomination thereon, asked by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland whether, in the event of his being nominated, he would consent to act or serve on said Committee; and, if the statement of the Lord Chancellor's interference is well founded, will he take steps to prevent the recurrence of it in future? He begged to add that if he had been aware of the facts previously to the Committee being named he would have objected to it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, that he was not aware whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had acted in the manner stated or not, nor had he thought it necessary to make any inquiry. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland being a Member of the Government, and being particularly responsible for the administration of justice in Ireland, and being also the author of the Juries (Ireland) Act, had naturally taken a very great interest in the discussions which had been held in this House on the Act, and he had himself consulted the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the constitution of the Committee which had been appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act. He thought it extremely probable that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had acted in the manner supposed; but, with great submission to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair and to the House, he begged to say he was not aware that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had acted in any way improperly in so doing.

THE MERCANTILE MARINE—THE STRAITS OF MAGELLAN.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it has been brought to his notice that another steamer the "Kenilworth," has struck on a sunken rock not noted in the Admiralty Charts, in the Straits of Magellan, and that this is the third steamer which has had similar mishap in the last twelve months; and, whether it would not be desirable, considering that these dangerous Straits are now the highway for steamers to the west coast of South America, to have a thorough re-survey of them and the entrances as early as possible?

MR. GOSCHEN: The only knowledge, Sir, we have of the Kenilworth having struck on a sunken rock in the Straits of Magellan is from a statement to that effect in a newspaper; but whether the rock was shown on the chart, or whether the Admiralty chart was in use we have no knowledge. We have no report of any other merchant vessels having struck in the Straits of Magellan during the time specified. The Straits of Magellan have been surveyed within a very recent period in anticipation of the increased traffic through them, and it is believed that all the dangers which exist are shown in the charts, although it may be possible that there are still some undiscovered. The most perfect charts will not always prevent accidents.

SUEZ CANAL — AUGMENTATION OF DUES.—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to be allowed to make a personal explanation. In the debate on the Suez Canal the other night he stated that the case of the litigation between the Messageries Maritimes and the Suez Canal Company was a matter of private arrangement, and had for its object to put the authority over the Suez Canal into the hands of the French Courts. The representative of the Messageries Maritimes begged him to say that this was not the fact, and that the litigation going on between the Companies was a bond fide litigation carried on in the most genuine manner. He was sorry if he had made any misrepresentation of the fact; but the correction did not affect his argument, which was that the proceedings ought to have been carried on in an Egyptian Court.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA—EUPHRATES VALLEY RAILWAY.

RESOLUTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON rose to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the evidence laid before the Select Committee on the Euphrates Valley Railway last Session demonstrates the great advantages, both politically and commercially, that would accrue to England by the acquisition of an alternative route to and from India, especially in case of any emergency arising, and that this object would be best secured by a Railway which would connect the Mediterranean with the head of the Persian Gulf; and, therefore, the Recommendation of the Select Committee on this subject to Her Majesty's Government is well deserving of their serious attention, with a view to carrying it into effect."

The hon. Baronet said, that he had endeavoured to word his Motion in such a manner as would induce Government to accede to it. He was aware that the word "guarantee" was one of which Her Majesty's Government had great dread; and the Committee which investigated the subject were careful in wording their Report, not to commit either themselves or the Government to the responsibility of a guarantee. His Motion for the appointment of a Committee, which was made on June 23, 1871, was carried by a majority of 86 to 10; and that showed that there was even then a prevalent feeling in favour of the object for which he proposed the appointment of the Committee. But whatever feeling then existed as to the alternative route to India had been strengthened immeasurably by events which had lately happened. There could be no doubt that the Central Asian question was one which had greatly increased the importance of the proposal he had to make to the House. The great advantages of the proposed line commercially, politically, and strategically, had already been proved before the Select Committee, by the most complete and overwhelming evidence. The great difficulty in the way of the construction of the line was, that its cost would be such that the Turkish Government would not be able to make it themselves. He was expressing his own opinion, not that of the Committee, when he said that by means of a counter-guarantee, such as he had always advocated, he did not believe this country would incur any real responsibility. The question was on what terms they should give this counter-guarantee. They were at the present moment going to pay £3,250,000 for the Geneva Award, which would never be of the slightest advantage to this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that this Award was simply to keep America in good humour, and that the New Rules would never be of the slightest benefit. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I never said so.] The right hon. Gentleman was so reported in his speech at Glasgow. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No.] At least he used words which led to that inference; but the counter-guarantee which he proposed would be of infinitely greater value to this country and to civilisation generally than the Geneva Award could ever be, by the acquisition of an alternative route to and from India, especially in case of any emergency arising. The Suez Canal had cost £16,000,000, and the highest estimate ever framed of the cost of this railway was from £8,000,000 to £10,000,000. His own opinion was, that if a proper gauge were adopted, the expenditure would fall much short of £10,000,000. They were not asked to guarantee the capital. The Turkish Government would borrow the money, and pay it into the Bank of England under certain conditions, one being that the money should be used for no other purpose but the construction of the railway. The Turkish Government would be liable for the interest of the loan, and the receipts of the railway, as well as certain other tributes, were to be devoted to that object. The counter-guarantee of this country would, therefore, never come into operation until the Turkish Government had failed to pay one sixpence of interest—until the railway failed to pay one sixpence of working expenses, and until all the contributions which were to be handed over to this country also failed. The only guarantee Turkey had from us was the loan of 1855, which was guaranteed by France and by England. The amount was £5,000,000, which was issued at 102½. The price remained the same now as when it was issued; and the loan had not cost this country sixpence. If we were to guarantee a loan to Turkey for the construction of this railway, he did not believe we should ever be called upon to pay a sixpence of interest. He wished to add that all which he had said was not embodied in the Resolution which he submitted to the House. All that he asked the Government to do was to resume the negotiations with the Turkish Government, in order to see whether any measures could be concerted between the two Governments for securing this alternative route between this country and India. The navigation by us of the Suez Canal was exposed to a variety of risks. A Question had already been asked in this House as to the imposition of prohibitory tolls, which indicated at least the possibility that some day, at the instance of a hostile Power, our shipping might be excluded by such tolls. Last Tuesday the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane) had on the Paper a Question relative to the Suez Canal, and it then appeared that the control of the Canal was in the hands of the French Government, or of the French and the Egyptian Governments. The French Government held £12,000,000 out of the £16,000,000 of capital, and therefore possessed a power which might any day be used detrimentally to us. Another kind of danger was indicated—first, by the report that the Serapis went ashore in the Suez Canal, and again by a recent report that the navigation of the Canal had been obstructed by a sunken ship. Although it might not be the case that the navigation of the Suez Canal had ever yet been interrupted, although no ships might have been sunk, what he wanted the House to consider was this, that if all these things were possible—and the day might come when, either by a sunken ship, or by some unexpected complication, by some or all of these means, the navigation of that Canal might be completely stopped—what would be the condition of England with regard to this Canal if we had no other equally rapid route open to us? We should have to send troops and everything necessary for their safety—and it might be for the salvation of India—round the Cape. He asked the House whether such a position was one which a great country like this ought to be content to be placed in? At Kurrachee we had a beautiful harbour—Mr. Parks, the consulting engineer of the Company, reported five weeks ago that already £480,000 had been expended upon it—which was capacious enough for ships 400 feet long and drawing 25 feet of water, and which, inside and outside, compared very advantageously with that of Bombay. After the outlay we had incurred at Kurrachee, it would be a great mistake not to facilitate the opening of the route which would give us direct communication with that harbour. No one would deny that the advantages of the route, commercially, strategically, and politically, would be to us very great, and the only question could be how far they would be worth the outlay this country might be called upon to make. At the outside that had been estimated by Sir Henry Rawlinson and Sir Bartle Frere at £80,000 a-year. Some of our highest military authorities were greatly in favour of the establishment of this route as an alternative route, and it was as an alternative route he advocated it. If the two routes were maintained in their integrity, there would be work enough for both. If by accident or design the Suez Canal were closed to this country, we should be placed in a position we should very soon regret. The Suez Canal was a route which was in no way under our control. It was pointed out in a pamphlet which had been submitted to him that the Canal passed through territory over which we had no control; that it was in the hands of a French company; that we used it to a certain extent on sufferance; and that the keepers of the key had it in their power at any moment to bar the passage indirectly by increasing the tolls, or directly, from political motives, by closing the gates. He thought he had said enough to show the House the necessity of providing ourselves with an alternative route. The more we could save ourselves from the high pressure of physical rule in India, and the more we could induce the natives to be governed by moral rule, the greater would be our hold on them, and the greater would be in the end their civilization and their attachment to us. Nothing would so much add to our moral prestige with the natives of India, as the knowledge that England had at her command an alternative and even a more rapid route than the Suez Canal. The main objection which Governments in this country had previously entertained against the Euphrates Valley Railway was caused by the well-known opinions of the late Emperor Napoleon on the subject; but now that eminent man was dead, he hoped such narrow-minded views would be abandoned, and that it would be admitted the interests both of this country and India required the construction of an alternative route which would make us independent of all accidents which might deprive us of the only route now available to us. When he thought of such historic names as Lord Clive and Lord Wellesley, and the Marquess of Hastings and General Pollock, and Lord Gough and Lord Strathnairn, and Sir Henry Lawrence and Lord Lawrence, and when he thought of the triumphs and the results which had ensued from the exertions of such men, backed as they were by the great power of England, he did hope that the danger of wasting all these achievements for the want of an alternative and rapid route to India, might be averted—as even on the score of expense it would be bad policy to incur such a risk—and he did hope that he might make a successful appeal to the House in favour of the alternative route on which so much in future might depend. If we lost the present op-

have formed an efficient army to act with the Turkish troops, of whose fitness for soldiers the late General Prim spoke in the highest terms. There could therefore be no doubt that if we had had command of these communications, we could have thrown in troops to any extent, and not only would Kars never have fallen, but Russia would have suffered great reverses. The mere alarm of Omar Pasha's advance, and the rumour of the intended movement of the Turkish Contingent sufficed to make the Russian General raise the siege of Kars, and though only for a few days, the interval was sufficient to enable the garrison to obtain supplies. And the knowledge that a force could be promptly sent from India would have had an effect most disastrous to the power of Russia. Too much importance could not therefore be attached to the results that would follow on our having the power of sending an Asiatic army which would have roused the population of a country by which Russia was greatly feared, whilst we inspired confidence wherever we went. Again, if during the Indian Mutiny, we had had this railway communication down the Valley of the Euphrates and up the Indus Valley, we should have been spared many anxious days and nights when we were looking out whether the Punjab was safe, or whether the whole of India was likely to rise up in rebellion against us, before we could pour in re-inforcements from home. He (Sir George Balfour) would also urge the necessity of making timely preparations for such events as the near approach of Russia to India might bring about. For instance, in the event of any complication in Europe, Russia might stir up the discontented spirits in and out of India. Russia, by her advances in Turkestan, and above all by the occupation of the Valley at the mouth of the Attrek, had so closely embraced Persia, that this country might at any time be constrained to advance either on India or to Mesopotamia. In the event of this dangerous combination, the line of communication through the Euphrates Valley would as Mr. Andrew represented to Lord Palmerston in 1857, enable us to threaten the flank and rear of any force advancing through Persia. There should therefore be no delay in securing another line of communication with India, independent of that through Egypt, so that when an emergency arose, we might meet it without apprehension, and with the conviction that we had in time of peace devised means of operating with effect, without entailing on India and England the burthen of maintaining great armies at vast expense.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the evidence laid before the Select Committee on the Euphrates Valley Railway last Session demonstrates the great advantages, both politically and commercially, that would accrue to England by the acquisition of an alternative route to and from India, especially in case of any emergency arising, and that this object would be best secured by a Railway which would connect the Mediterranean with the head of the Persian Gulf; and, therefore, the Recommendation of the Select Committee on this subject to Her Majesty's Government is well deserving of their serious attention, with a view to carrying it into effect,"

—(Sir George Jenkinson.)

MR. DODSON observed that, if we looked only for the most direct cut from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf, the line on the right bank of the Euphrates no doubt supplied the easiest and cheapest of the various routes suggested. The country for engineering purposes was easy; but for 700 miles along the banks of the Euphrates there was scarcely a town worthy of the name. The country was barren, and, owing to the absence of tributary streams, no cultivation had ever been possible, except in a narrow strip along the bank of the river. The animosity of the wandering tribes which inhabited it was principally directed against the Turkish Government, and if they received a subsidy the chiefs of these tribes would protect the railway against injury, especially if they understood it to be an English concern. On the other hand, there was no local traffic, and it would be simply a military line, by which England might send troops to India on some extraordinary emergency. In ordinary times it would be merely a line for the conveyance of Indian mails or first-class passengers. The local traffic would consist principally of pilgrims on the way to the shrines of Kerbela and Meshed Ali, and of coffins.

Valley line, the highest authorities had insisted on the importance of having an alternative line, and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, Lord Canning, and Lord Strathnairn had pointed out the necessity of the Euphrates line. The Turkish Government were most favourably disposed towards the project. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was not asked to make any advance of public money. The Turkish Government would advance the money upon our guarantee. When we considered the enormous importance it was to keep open our communications with India, he could not imagine that the Government would hesitate to take the subject into their consideration. We had recently heard a great deal about the progress of Russia in the East; but even supposing she did move down, if we had this alternative line we should have our communications safe from the Mediterranean Sea to the Persian Gulf, and should have nothing to fear from Russia. He therefore trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not take the advice given him by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson).

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he had the misfortune to differ from the rest of the Committee upon this subject, they thought this railway of so great importance that they recommended the cost should be provided by a British guarantee on the back of a Turkish loan. He, on the other hand, moved an Amendment to the effect that it was not advisable to incur any pecuniary liability for the construction of a railway in a foreign country. It might be assumed that the promoters of this undertaking had no faith in its financial results or they would not have held a Government guarantee indispensable to raise the money. The line would never be used for through traffic to India. For any receipts it must depend entirely on local traffic. No doubt more traffic could be picked up on the Tigris than on the Euphrates line; but all the accounts which had been received precluded the idea of any remunerative return until some extraordinary change should take place in the condition of the country. Our Consul at Aleppo, for instance, stated that two trains would suffice to carry the whole annual export and import trade of all the towns except Aleppo and Bagdad, and that one carriage would accommodate all the passengers. Other authorities spoke quite as decisively on this point. If the line were regarded merely as a means of relieving our troops in India, he did not believe that it would ever vie with the Canal. It was generally assumed that the troops could be conveyed through without stopping. That was not, however, the case; and, as Lord Sandhurst had shown, it would be necessary to have resting-places, as in India, every 250 miles. It was said that all the objections that had been urged to the construction of the line would disappear in the case of a great emergency arising, but on that point he would refer the House to the testimony of Lord Sandhurst, who totally dissented from that view, and held that the acceleration of the journey by 15 or 20 days was practically of no importance whatever. He (Sir Charles Wingfield) believed that if Kurrachee were adopted as a terminus instead of Bombay there might be a saving of two or three days; but he did not think that Kurrachee would be substituted for Bombay for military purposes. He regarded the Euphrates Valley line as inferior in every respect to the Canal route through Egypt, except in respect of the saving of two or three days, to which he attached little value. The only advantage it could possess was a second line of communication. That was a good thing, no doubt even though it be inferior to the existing line of communication, but it was not an advantage to attain which we ought to expend money. He therefore dissented entirely from the recommendation of the Select Committee, and must protest against this country or India incurring any pecuniary risk or liability whatever in the promotion of this undertaking.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought it desirable that there should be no misunderstanding as to the real intentions and object of the Report of the Select Committee or as to the meaning of the Resolution of his hon. Friend (Sir George Jenkinson). The question of guarantee had been very distinctly put aside by his hon. Friend, who did not propose to ask the House to commit itself to any such principle. He did, however, by his Motion ask the House to affirm the recommendation of the Select Committee. He wished for a few moments to recall the attention of the House to the circumstances under which the Committee was appointed two years ago. The question of establishing a route of some kind between England and India by way of Syria or Mesopotamia had been for many years under consideration—and that long before there was any idea of constructing the Suez Canal. It was deemed desirable that there should not only be communication by sea, but that a second line of communication by railway through Syria or Mesopotamia should be secured. Two years ago his hon. Friend the Member for North Wilts (Sir George Jenkinson) brought the subject under the consideration of the House, and moved for a Select Committee to inquire into it. At the same time a very important step was taken by the Government of India, who in a despatch to the Secretary of State, which was appended to the Report of the Committee, said that India had derived great advantages from the opening of the Suez Canal, and that, upon the whole, they desired to offer such encouragement as might be possible to the project for constructing a railway from either the Bosphorus or the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf; but they added that they were opposed to the undertaking receiving pecuniary assistance from or becoming chargeable upon the resources of the Empire. At the time when that Select Committee was appointed such were the general views of the position of the question taken by the Government of India. The Government of this country agreed to the Inquiry, on the ground that the question was one of considerable importance, which had never been fully discussed, and as to which a good deal of information was required, and they wished to know whether the line was capable of being made, and whether it was likely to be remunerative. The Committee considered these questions, and agreed to a Report which was now in the hands of the House. In many senses the Report was not a final one. For example, the Committee thought that a line was advisable, but did not determine the particular line to be adopted—whether by the Euphrates route or the Tigris route—or the advantages of this or that point of departure. The Committee felt it was impossible to get sufficiently clear evidence on these questions without an actual survey. Upon the financial part of the question the Committee arrived at a tolerably clear conclusion—namely, that it was improbable that any private company would undertake to construct this line; and that the Turkish Government would hardly be disposed to give either any guarantee or any great facilities to a private company. At the same time, the Committee had reason to believe that the Turkish Government would be anxious to co-operate with Her Majesty's Government; but here the powers of the Committee failed them. They could not undertake a survey, nor could they call evidence in order to elicit the views of the Turkish Government. Some Correspondence was, indeed, laid before them which had passed between the Turkish Ambassador and his hon. Friend (Sir George Jenkinson). But the Committee would have exceeded their functions had they communicated with a Foreign Minister in order to ascertain what the Turkish Government were ready to do in this matter. The Committee, therefore, believing that the matter was worth pursuing, recommended that Her Majesty's Government should take it up, and that a joint survey should be made to determine upon the best route. If, they added, the enterprise were to be regarded as one simply affecting British interests, it would be wisest to adopt the shortest and most direct route by the Euphrates Valley; if the co-operation of the Turkish Government were desired, the Government might prefer the Tigris route, and any such preference would be a material point in determining the question. The Resolution now submitted expressed no preference for any particular route, and therefore did not pre-judge the question. It should be remembered that though no railway was in course of execution to connect the two seas, various plans were under consideration in the district, and the Committee had reason to believe that the Turkish Government were actually engaged in making lines for their own benefit, which would more or less occupy some portion of the ground to which our attention had been drawn. It was desirable to communicate with the Turkish Government on this subject, so that both Governments might co-operate for their mutual benefit. Another question was as to the progress made in lines promoted by other countries besides Turkey. We found, for instance, that the Russian lines were gradually being pushed to the frontiers of Turkey, and it was reported to be in contemplation to carry a line from Tiflis to the head of the Persian Gulf. Within the last few days there was a rumour of a scheme for connecting the Russian lines with Kurrachee; and we had been told of a concession made to Baron Reuter of a monopoly of railways and telegraphs in Persia. It was important that we should know the meaning of all this. Another matter which deserved attention was how far we could develop the railway systems of the East so as to give a fair opening for the commercial produce of Persia and Asia Minor in such a manner as to work in with our own commercial interests and prevent the giving of such a monopoly to Russia as she was inclined to secure if possible. These considerations added greatly to the importance of the whole subject. His hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had warned us that commercial companies at the Suez Canal might seriously cripple our trade by imposing heavy tolls at the Suez Canal. It would be of great importance for us to have some alternative route, if it were merely for the sake of keeping the Suez route in order; and he hoped that the Government, even though they might not altogether approve of the Report of the Committee, or the Resolution, might put themselves into communication with the Turkish Government, in order to ascertain their views, and see how far it was possible for the two Governments to act together. There were various other modes besides that of a guarantee by which encouragement could be given by the Government for the making of a line. For instance, they might undertake to use the line for certain purposes, such as the carrying of our mails, or of a certain portion of our troops. But that was a matter on which there might be a difference of opinion. All that the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts and himself desired to pledge the House and the Government to, if this Motion were adopted was, that they should not put this matter aside in the rather curt manner in which he thought it was put aside when a Question was asked at the beginning of the Session; but that the Government should put themselves in communication with the Turkish Government or their Representative here, and ascertain what the feeling of that Government was, and in that way should give this matter a serious and careful consideration.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was one thing which the House should clearly understand, and that was the effect of the Motion for which they had been asked to vote. The hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts (Sir George Jenkinson) very earnestly and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), he thought, with less confidence, had both endeavoured to persuade the House that the question of guarantee was not raised on this Motion at all. It was a matter of considerable importance that the House should attend to what the meaning of this Motion really was. The hon. Baronet summed up the result of the Motion in this way—

“Therefore, the recommendations of the Select Committee on this subject to Her Majesty’s Government were well worthy their serious attention with the view of carrying them into effect.”

The hon. Baronet said the recommendations of the Select Committee, whatever they were, were well worthy the serious consideration of the Government with the view of carrying them into effect, and if the House adopted his Motion they recommended Her Majesty’s Government to carry into effect the recommendations of the Committee, and those recommendations were ascertained by reference to the last paragraph of the Report. The Committee clearly pointed to incurring a pecuniary risk, for after speaking of several things they said they were of opinion—

“That it would be worth the while of the English Government to make an effort to secure them, considering the moderate pecuniary risk which they would incur.”

They further believed that this might “Best be done by opening communication with the Government of Turkey—in the sense indicated by the semi-official Correspondence to which they had already drawn attention.”

What was the “semi-official Correspondence?” It appeared that the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts (Sir George Jenkinson) having no doubt a special commission to represent Her Majesty—for he could find no trace of such an authority in the Blue Book—entered into a Diplomatic correspondence with the Turkish Ambassador, and felt himself justified on behalf of the Government in submitting a proposal to the effect that the funds should be raised by means of an Ottoman Loan, interest at the rate of 54 per cent per annum, and £1 per cent Sinking Fund to be guaranteed by England. The hon. Baronet referred to the recommendations of the Committee. The recommendations of the Committee referred him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to the hon. Baronet, and that was what he had suggested, adding that it was accepted by the Turkish Minister. Therefore it was as plain as anything could possibly be, that if the House adopted the Motion of the hon. Baronet, the House and the Government would be pledged to the principle that a guarantee should be given for this railway. Here he might very well stop, because, as the Motion did not give effect to the intention avowed by its supporters, they had nothing to do but to withdraw it. He was not prepared, having no special knowledge of the subject, to argue the matter as to whether it was advisable that such a line should be made. He readily admitted that if some one else made the line it would be just as well, and probably better, to have an alternative line; but the arguments advanced on the point were most fallacious. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) said if a ship was sunk in the Suez Canal this line would give an alternative route; but was there no alternative route except by the Cape of Good Hope? He was of opinion that such an alternative route was afforded by the railway from Alexandria to Cairo, and from Cairo to Port Said on the Red Sea. Were we to suppose that some foreign Power would drive us out of Egypt, which was a country so favourable to the operations of a maritime nation? Or, was it assumed that we should be unable to maintain a way through the Desert? England could exist without India, but British India could not exist without England, and it would seem that if anybody was desirous to have this route it should be the Indian Government. But the Indian Government, with no objection to have it if somebody else would make it, declined to have anything to do with its construction, and it was proposed that England alone should bear the burden. Although we had guaranteed lines in our Colonies, we had never yet ventured to guarantee a line in a foreign country. Every possible objection that could be urged against a route had been asserted with regard to this line. Alexandretta was unhealthy, Bassorah was deadly, and Grane little less deadly. There was no irrigation; there were no settled inhabitants, but only predatory and nomad tribes; the heat was almost more insufferable than in any other place; it never had been inhabited, and never would be to the end of time. This was the kind of country through which we were asked to guarantee a railway. Turkey was interested in making the railway, and if she could ever afford to make it she would make it, no doubt; but she would not now advance money either with or without a guarantee, for the simple reason that she had not got it. As he had said, India had an interest in the line, but would not have it; and it was proposed that England, having comparatively a very slight interest, should entreat Turkey to accept a guarantee of £10,000,000, in order to make this railway. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight said, quite pathetically, "Pray, do not let this golden opportunity slip, for it may never occur again." He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was under no apprehension, for he believed that if we were ever prepared to offer a guarantee of 10,000,000 of money we should not find any insuperable difficulty in getting Turkey to accept it. As the Motion pledged the House to force upon the Government a guarantee for this line, he hoped the House would not adopt it.

Mr. EASTWICK said, he wished to explain to the House certain circumstances which had completely altered the aspect of affairs since the Report of the Committee was made. But before doing so he would refer to the argument that we ought to have nothing to do with this scheme unless it would be a financial success. Were we to disregard everything but financial success? The Suez Canal was not a success, very much because the Government opposed it. It cost £16,000,000; but if the Government had taken it up in a different spirit it would not have cost more than two-thirds of that sum. Still, though the outlay was great, no one could dispute that the Canal was an immense advantage. With regard to the new circumstances which had occurred, he might mention that on the 25th of July last year His Majesty the Shah of Persia made a concession which was about the most remarkable concession which had ever been made by any foreign country. That concession gave to Baron de Reuter power to make all railways, tramways, or roadways throughout the country, and to work the valuable mines of Persia, which only required science to develop them; and also gave a guarantee of 7 per cent. Persia pledged the revenue of the country as security, and extended the guarantee over a period of 24 years from March, 1874. That was very remarkable, and showed great energy on the part of the Shah, who was evidently resolved to develop the resources of his country. Concessions from Oriental Governments, however, had not been uncommon, and, perhaps, the House might require proofs of the intention of the concessionnaire to keep to his bargain. These proofs were forthcoming—£40,000 had been paid into the Bank of England, an amount which would be forfeited if the materials for the line were not landed at Resht within 15 months. A staff of nine engineers, the best that could be selected, had already arrived at Tehrân, and would commence operations immediately, and two mining engineers of the highest ability were on their way to explore all the mines of Persia, and examine whether the wealth reputed to be contained in them really existed. The first line to be made would run from Resht, on the Caspian, to Tehrân, and thence to Isfahân. If it were asked why the railway should be commenced near the spot to which attention had been drawn by the operations of Russia, the reply was that it was impossible to land materials in Persia by any other route, except at a vast expense. But by this route there was water carriage, and he had crossed the Caspian in a steamer which had been sent out in pieces from England, had been put together in the Volga, and had then begun work on the Caspian. The British public might be re-assured also by the fact that this undertaking would be directed by a naturalized Englishman whose sympathies were entirely with England. Within a space of two or three years, then, there would be a line from the Caspian to Isfahân, which would afterwards no doubt pass down to the Persian Gulf. This fact changed the whole view of the matter, and rendered it a primary object to make a line which would give through communication with India overland. The heat of the proposed route, over which he had passed, had been much exaggerated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had never been there. There would be the same route as before from the Mediterranean to Anah, but the line from thence to the head of the Persian Gulf, though no doubt it would be made, would become of secondary importance, and the line from Anah to Karâchî would be the most important. From Anah it would be carried 260 miles to Tâk i Girah. Tâk i Girah is on the Persian frontier and close to Khânîkin, where the telegraph line runs from Tehrân to Baghdâd. From Tâk i Girah the railway would be carried to Karmânshâh, a flourishing city of 30,000 inhabitants, 60 miles. There it would pass over the only route by which both mountains and difficult and rapid streams could be avoided 400 miles to Shirâz. He had himself been at Karmânshâh, and had been informed of this locality, and it was the only possible through route to Karâchî; for that round the head of the Persian Gulf was impracticable, owing to swamps, rivers, and lofty mountains. At Shirâz, or perhaps earlier, the line from Alexandretta would form a junction with the line coming from Resht and Tehrân to the Persian Gulf; it would then be continued 300 miles to Bandar Abbâs, and then 670 miles to Karâchî. Thus the total distance from the Mediterranean overland to Karâchî in India would be only 2,130 miles. That would imply an enormous saving of time. The journey from Dover to Brindisi took 10 days, and the route across to Kurrachee would occupy 114 hours, and it would not be necessary to break bulk. A great deal had been said as to Lord Sandhurst's objection that the soldiers would have to get out for rest and refreshment every 200 miles; but in refutation of such an idea he could refer to his hon. Colleague, who had travelled from Moscow to Odessa, a distance of 1,040 miles, without finding himself more tired than he was by a 3 o'clock sitting of the House. By adopting the Resolution they would be showing for the first time for many years a feeling of friendship towards Persia, to which he thought the country intervening between India and the great advancing Power of the North was entitled. Persia was doing all she could to enter into the position of a civilized nation. It had been the fashion hitherto to depreciate Persia on all hands. It was said her population since the famine had immensely decreased; some said it was 3,500,000, and others 4,000,000; and that the country must fall into the voracious mouth of Russia. He did not believe that; and was sure all those estimates of population were conjectural. However that might be, there was no race in the world more intellectual than the Persian, or more likely to make a figure again in the world as soon as it had been indoctrinated with European civilization. It was on these grounds he supported the Motion; and it was not, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, a mere question of guarantee, but of whether the Government were to put this scheme aside, or to give it encouragement which would induce commercial men to support it. The possibility of the closing of the Suez Canal, too, must not be lost sight of. It might be closed either by accident or by the foolish policy of the Canal Company. He invited the House to support the Resolution, which did no more than declare this scheme to be worthy of the consideration of the Government.

Mr. MUNTZ said, if this Motion were adopted, the Government would be encouraged, if not obliged to give a guarantee for a railway in a foreign country—an act that had never yet been done, and he trusted never would. The question divided itself into two parts, the commercial and the military; and in order to obtain security for either purpose it was indispensable that they should have the control of the Mediterranean, in which case we could control the passage of the Suez Canal. In the statement made in the recommendation of the project no account had been taken of the time that would be lost in loading and unloading on the Syrian coast, and in re-embarking and re-loading at the southern termini of the line. Were that matter gone into, he strongly suspected it would turn out that there would be a loss of time instead of a gain. He would remind the House that the description of the late Member for Poona of the journey from Moscow to Odessa written the important fact that it was performed in sleeping carriages. Now, sleeping cars could scarcely be provided for soldiers, and he thought it would be somewhat cruel to expose them to the suffering which would be entailed by travelling 114 hours under the circumstances. It must also be borne in mind that in passing over a foreign country with troops it would be difficult to exercise a proper control over them, and he did not believe that Turkey would allow us to extend our Mutiny Act to her territory. He could not see any commercial or military advantage whatever in giving the guarantee for a sum which, it was said, would be only £10,000,000, but which was more likely to turn out £20,000,000. He should therefore certainly vote against the Resolution if it were pressed to a division.

Mr. BRAND said, he was a member of the Committee which sat on the subject, and that Committee, after a careful consideration of it, had recommended that a partial guarantee should be given. He could not acquiesce altogether in the interpretation which had been put by the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon their recommendations.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 29: Majority 74.

SPAIN—ASSAULT ON MR. HENRY DIEDRICH JENCKEN.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

Mr. SERJEANT SIMON, in rising to call attention to the outrages committed upon Mr. H. D. Jencken, a British subject in Spain, and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to direct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with the Spanish Government with the view to obtaining compensation for Mr. H. D. Jencken, on account of the injuries received by him at the hands of the populace at Lercs in 1869."

said, Mr. Jencken, a member of the English Bar, went to Spain in 1869 professionally on behalf of a commercial company, to prosecute certain important suits involving British interests to a very large amount. These suits were, of course, instituted before the Spanish tribunals; and for this purpose Mr. Jencken had occasion to visit the town of Lercs, in the province of Murcia. While that gentleman was walking in the public gardens of Lorca an exclamation proceeded from a woman, in consequence of which a large mob set upon him and inflicted upon him the severest injuries. It appeared that in that part of Spain an extraordinary superstition was entertained by the common people that certain infamous persons went into the country for the purpose of kidnapping young children and putting them to death in order to obtain the fat of their bodies for the repair of the telegraph wires. Such a person was called "tio del sain," or fatmonger. It appeared that the description of Mr. Jencken had been promulgated in Lorca as being one of those persons, and the woman's exclamation, "tio del sain!" soon spreading, he was set upon by a mob armed with stones, daggers, knives, and other deadly weapons. He received 15 serious wounds, besides severe bruises and blows, on various parts of the body. Eight of the wounds were on the head and face; a dagger was thrust into his mouth, which broke his jawbone, and several wounds on the temples and back of the head penetrating to the bone. Some of those who joined in the outrages were officials who ought to have afforded him protection. He was dragged in a state of extreme suffering to the Town Hall, whence he was conveyed to a place where his wounds were dressed. A day or two after the Judge visited him to take his depositions against the guilty persons, it being supposed that he was in a dying condition. The Judge asked him whether he would take part in the prosecution of the rioters, at the same time advising him not to do so, because if he did the state of feeling in the town was such that Mr. Jencken's life would not be safe. Mr. Jencken said he did not care anything about the prosecution, and that he would appeal to the Government. He was confined to his bed for 30 days, and afterwards, while still suffering from his wounds, went to Madrid, where he visited Marshal Serrano, then at the head of the Spanish Government, and from whom he had received a friendly letter, expressing regret at the ill-treatment he had undergone, and offering to afford him redress. Mr. Jencken also left a statement of his case with our Ambassador at Madrid, in 1870, when he returned to England; it was likewise laid before Lord Clarendon, with a request that his Lordship would obtain from the Spanish Government compensation for the injuries he had sustained. There seemed to be some reason to suspect that the mob had been instigated in their attack by some of the persons against whom Mr. Jencken originally went to enforce legal claims at Lorca; and if so it was a most serious matter, for what English subject would go abroad to represent commercial interests and to prosecute legal claims against Spanish subjects, if reports were to be spread abroad which induced fanatical mobs to beat and wound them within an inch of their lives. The Vice Consul wrote to Mr. Turner, the British Consul, giving an account of the transaction, in which he mentioned the binding of Mr. Jencken's hands by two of the Volunteers of Liberty, and the part taken by the Alcalde of the suburbs—facts subsequently denied by the Spanish Minister. Thirteen of the 23 persons originally arrested were tried and convicted, the sentence, a copy of which was sent to Mr. Jencken, stating that no indemnity had been awarded on account of his having expressly renounced it. Lord Clarendon called on Mr. Jencken for an explanation of this statement, which appeared to preclude any claim to compensation, and Mr. Jencken informed Lord Clarendon that the alleged renunciation consisted in his (Mr. Jencken's) having, under the advice of the local authorities, declined to take part in the criminal prosecution, no intimation having been given him at the time that a civil remedy was attached to it. Lord Clarendon thereupon wrote to Mr. Layard to say that, having consulted the Law Advisers of the Crown, he thought he might under the circumstances submit the case to the Spanish Government, with the expression of a hope that compensation would be awarded to Mr. Jencken for his serious and unmerited sufferings. Thus the case stood at the time of Lord Clarendon's lamented death. Lord Granville, his successor, on being applied to, promised an investigation of the case, and Mr. Layard afterwards enclosed to him a letter from Senor Sagasta, Minister of the Interior, declining to grant compensation on the ground that Mr. Jencken had definitely renounced it. Senor Sagasta also denied that any Volunteers or "right-minded persons" took part in the assault; but this denial as to the Volunteers was at variance with the Vice Consul's narrative. Thereupon Lord Granville, after consulting the Law Officers of the Crown, decided that the British Government would not be justified in pressing the claim further. Now, considering that the alleged renunciation was known to Lord Clarendon and the Law Officers, it was strange that two Foreign Ministers, acting on the same facts, and taking the same advice—the advice it would seem of the same Law Officers—should come to opposite conclusions. What was the renunciation worth of a man who could hardly articulate, and was indeed almost a dead man at the time? It was absurd to talk of recovering damages against a mere mob, who, as the papers showed, were too poor to pay even a small proportion of the costs of the prosecution. Had Mr. Jencken proceeded against them, of course our Government would have said that he had made his election and that, having failed through the insolvency of the parties, they could not interfere. As to the quibble raised by the Spanish Minister, it was more worthy of a small practitioner in a petty Court of Law than the Minister of a great nation; and he was sorry, indeed, that it should have been sanctioned by our own Minister. It might be said, "Have we a right to claim compensation from a foreign Government for injuries inflicted upon a British subject?" Vattel, Grotius, Kent, Wheaton, and other authorities were clear in favour of the proposition that "when foreigners are admitted into a country, the public faith of that country becomes pledged for their protection." This passage from Kent was quoted by Sir Roundell Palmer in the Debate upon the murder of British subjects by the Greek brigands. Sir Robert Phillimore was an authority to the same effect, and we had ourselves repeatedly acted upon this principle. When Don Pacifico, a naturalized Englishman, had his house sacked by a mob of Greeks, he claimed compensation from the Greek Government, and Lord Palmerston sent a fleet to enforce the claim. Whatever might have been the policy of this act, or the good faith of the claim advanced, the question of our right to interfere was never raised. Again, there was the case of Mr. Sullivan at Lima; and at Naples in 1850, when some French-

men's houses were destroyed by a mob, the French Government claimed and obtained compensation for these persons. They were met by the plea that the Neapolitan law would not have given compensation to Neapolitans; but the answer of the French Government was, "We have nothing to do with your municipal law, we take our stand upon international law, which overrides your municipal law." Again, between the Americans and Portuguese. Some American citizens having been subjected to outrage on the part of the Portuguese, the American Government demanded redress from the Government of Portugal and received it. Then there was the case of the Greek brigands, in which we had obtained compensation from the Government of Greece. In fact he had a plethora of precedents in this matter, and his only difficulty was to make a selection. He would appeal to the British Government as having themselves sanctioned the course of action which he advocated. From first to last the question of right had never been raised. Lord Clarendon, the moment he was appealed to, set himself in motion to obtain redress. Lord Granville at first did the same, and therefore the Government were now estopped from raising this question of legal right if so disposed. What then, did their objection resolve itself into? To this—that Mr. Jencken had, as the Spanish Minister stated, voluntarily waived his right. But the House would have seen, from what he had already stated, how much there was in the so-called waiver, and what little reliance was to be placed on the allegations in Senor Sagasta's letter. It was true he had brought forward this question on a night when he could not challenge a decision upon it; but for that he did not care. He preferred to put the matter on this footing—that it was one which was well worthy of the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Here was a gentleman of position, of attainments, of professional eminence, peacefully pursuing a lawful avocation abroad, supposing that he was under the protection of the Government of the country in which he was, and in the last resort of his own Government. He found no protection under the Spanish Government, and now he sought redress from his own. He hoped the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, however advised at the present time, would reconsider the circumstances of the case, especially as this was by no means a solitary instance in which we had ground of complaint against Spain.

SPAIN—SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR THE CARLISTS.—QUESTION.

MR. STAPLETON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering the heavy damages this Country has to pay for the participation of individuals in matters connected with the civil war in America, he will take measures to prevent British subjects from raising subscriptions, which are not for a loan with a view to profit, but for a gift gratuitously given, in order to foment the civil war in Spain?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Spanish Minister recently called the attention of Her Majesty's Government to an advertisement which had appeared in The Westminster Gazette, inviting subscriptions in behalf of the Carlists in Spain, and claimed the protection of British Law against proceedings of that character. In consequence of that representation, it was the duty of my noble Friend (Lord Granville) to examine into the state of the law, and he referred the question to the Law Officers of the Crown for their opinion. The opinion of the Law Officers was to this effect,—that the advertisement being a request for gifts—though a contract for that purpose would be illegal, and not capable of being enforced in an English Court—it did not amount to any infraction of the law at all. There is nothing to prevent any person giving or any person asking money for such a purpose. That being so, I need not say it is not in the power of Her Majesty's Government in any way to go beyond the law.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS AFTER EASTER.—QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, When he intends to introduce the Bill for the amendment of the Education Act 1870?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to reply instead of my right hon. Friend; for the general arrangement of Business after the Recess is a matter for which the Government are responsible as a whole rather than any particular Department. The arrangement with regard to Public Business stands thus. It is understood by the House that the first Monday after the recess will be devoted in the first instance to the consideration of the Bill for the Abolition of Tests in the University of Dublin. We look, in conformity with usage, to the Thursday following as the earliest day when we could invite the attention of the House to the discussion of the financial measures of the Government. After that, it would have been our first duty immediately to proceed with the Bill for the amendment of the Education Act, 1870; but the hon. Gentleman will have observed that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) has given Notice of a Motion for Tuesday, the 29th of April, with respect to local taxation, one of the subjects referred to in the Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the Session. That being so, we think we must anticipate that, as a natural and necessary consequence of that Motion of the hon. Baronet, who is not in any concert with us, we should proceed, perhaps, to declare the intentions of the Government on that important question, and probably to give effect to those intentions. In consequence of that change, for which we are not responsible, it will be necessary for us to postpone for a time the introduction of the measure for the amendment of the Education Act of 1870. I do not, beyond this question of local taxation, anticipate any other cause of postponement in the bringing in of the Bill referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend, and I hope he will in the meantime be satisfied with my assurance that no inconvenience to the question in which he is interested is likely to arise in consequence.

SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS.
QUESTION.

MR. AKROYD asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, If his attention has been called to the heavy charge of the returning officer for the election of seven members to the School Board of the small parish of Hinckley, in the county of Leicester, amounting to £150, equivalent to a rate of nearly threepence in the pound, until subsequently reduced to £125; whether there be no appeal beyond the Poor Law Auditor; and, whether he would consider the feasibility of framing a scale of charges, on the basis of the population or the number of voters, so that the parishioners should not be left in the hands of the auditor as the sole court of appeal?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the charge to which allusion was made. It could hardly be said that the election was for a small parish. Hinckley having 7,000 inhabitants; but, undoubtedly, it was a heavy charge, though not amounting to more than 2d. not 3d. in the pound. The Local Government Board were making inquiries of the auditor why he had allowed it, and no answer had yet been received. A new register had to be made. The rate-payers had an appeal to the Local Government Board; he was carefully considering with his noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) and the Local Government Board, whether any change could be made in that particular with regard to elections.

PATENT RIGHTS—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any communications regarding a Conference relating to Patents for Inventions which is intended to be held at Vienna next August, and will state its object; whether Her Majesty's Government will be represented at that Conference; and, if he will lay upon the Table what documentary information Her Majesty's Government has received regarding it; and, whether the answers to inquiries which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs made last year in regard to international arrangements as to inventions are now completed?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, a Despatch was only yesterday received from Sir Andrew Buchanan, stating that, in accordance with a suggestion of the United States Government, the General Direction of the Universal Exhibition at Vienna intends to unite therewith an International Congress to discuss the question of Patent Rights. This information has not, however, been communicated to Her Majesty's Ambassador officially by the Austro-Hungarian Government, but by the United States Minister at the Court of Vienna. The question has not, therefore, reached a stage where Her Majesty's Government could take any action upon it. Reports upon the state of the Patent Laws in foreign countries have been received from Her Majesty's Secretaries of Legation, with a few exceptions, and are now in the printers' hands preparatory to their being laid before Parliament.

FRANCE—THE COMMERCIAL TREATY,
1872.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. MACFIE,

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Mr. Van Bosse has been appointed "to act as arbitrator," in accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol appended to the New Commercial Treaty, "in regard to any points in connection with the questions of existing contracts, and relating to British mineral oils, and the duties to be levied upon them," on which the Commissioners now sitting at Paris shall not have been able to agree.

INDIA—RAILWAY GAUGE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the question of a break of gauge on the lines of Railway in the Punjab has been re-considered by the Secretary of State with reference to the recent debate in this House on that subject; and, if so, whether he will lay the Despatch containing the decision of the Secretary of State before this House, together with Copy of all Minutes by members of Council in support of or in dissent from the said decision?

MR. GRANT DUFF: There will be, Sir, no objection whatever to laying these Papers on the Table if they are moved for in the usual way, as soon as the consideration of the subject promised by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government is complete.

MERCANTILE MARINE — UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS — THE "SEA QUEEN." QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether Thomas Newton and John Kirkpatrick, the two Revenue officers who were on board the "Sea Queen" during the whole time that vessel was in the port of Newcastle before her last voyage, were called as witnesses on the inquiry into the loss of that vessel; and, if they were not called, whether he will state the reasons why they were not called; whether George Jefferson and William Ferris, who were engaged to discharge the "Sea Queen's" cargo on her arrival at Newcastle, were called as witnesses on the inquiry; and, if they were not, if he will state the reason why they were not called; and, whether it did not appear that the evidence these witnesses were prepared to tender, was to the effect that the vessel was in such a leaky state that she had to be pumped before the men could commence to unload her; and that as to Jefferson and Ferris, they in unloading the vessel had to stand in water half-way up their legs sometimes, and sometimes only over their boot tops, and that she was pumped daily for three hours by the donkey engine for three days to keep down the water, and afterwards by hand during the whole time she was in port?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE:

The House would doubtless remember the nature of the former Question of the hon. Member relative to the Sea Queen, and this supplementary Question was asked for the purpose of supporting a statement made by the hon. Member at a public meeting in London to this effect, that "the evidence of the officers of the Customs in this case had been suppressed by order of the Board of Trade," which was naturally followed by cries of "Shame." He then went on to say that "there was another class — the lumpers. These men were summoned, but their evidence was also suppressed," which was also followed by "loud cries of 'Shame.'" "Well, then," he asked, "with all the evidence adduced on the inquiry—with all the circumstances of the case showing that the Surveyor of the Board of Trade was trying to exculpate the owners, what confidence could they have in the Board of Trade?" It was to sustain this statement that the hon. Member asked his former Question, which he answered as fully and accurately as he could, and, he believed, to the entire satisfaction of the House. The hon. Member had followed that up by the present Question. He had made careful inquiry as to the statements contained in the Question of the hon. Member. He had submitted them to the Solicitor of the Customs, who acted on the inquiry and on all such inquiries on the part of the Board of Trade. It was absolutely impossible for the Board of Trade itself and the officials of the Board of Trade in London to decide as to what particular witnesses should or should not be called in the course of any particular inquiry. These inquiries were very numerous, and were placed in the hands of the Solicitor of the Customs, who acted under regulations, having all the information possessed by the Board of Trade, and did his best to ascertain the facts in each case. In this particular case, the only question, so far as the Board of Trade knew, was whether there had been any overloading. There was no statement of any other kind of unseaworthiness, such as being in a leaky state. Immediately upon receiving the statements, the Board of Trade ordered an inquiry, and Mr. O'Dowd proceeded to Newcastle for that purpose. He summoned the two Customs officers whose names appeared in this Question as not being called. They were called. The evidence of those two officers, Thomas Newton and John Kirkpatrick, would be found in the proceedings of the Court which had been laid before Parliament. The Solicitor to the Customs added that he called one other witness upon the question of leakage—a German sailor, who was in the ship on a former voyage; and he then made up his mind that the evidence on the point of leakage would not be sufficient for his purpose, and he decided to confine himself to the original issue—that of overloading. The Solicitor of the Customs added in the letter which he held in his hand, that he accepted exclusively the responsibility for the conduct of the inquiry, and he would not even stoop to deny the assertion that there was any suppression of evidence or any disposition to shelter the owners. Coming from a gentleman of high character and integrity, who was charged with something amounting almost to corruption, these words of indignation were not misplaced.

Afterwards—

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—THE
"ELEANOR"—MR. PLIMSOLL AND THE BOARD OF TRADE.
QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is by his authority or knowledge that a person calling himself an official member of the Board of Trade has visited both Cardiff and Swansea immediately after A. Hooker, esquire, solicitor, London; and, in consequence of instructions given by this person, the Government officials have declined to give the information which they were previously willing and anxious to tender; and, if he would state to the House, by what authority a letter was written to Mr. Miller, collector of customs, Cardiff, forbidding him to give any information to Mr. Hooker, without an order from Government?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, he was glad the Question had been asked, because he perceived that the hon. Member had made a statement at Liverpool which the Question was likely to clear up. That statement was that the Board of Trade had made some special objections to giving information at Cardiff. It was by his (Mr. Chichester Fortescue's) authority that a proper officer of the Board of Trade—Captain Digby Murray—visited Cardiff and Swansea and other ports about the time mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. He had some difficulty in at first discovering whether this was before or immediately after the visit of Mr. A. Hooker, solicitor, London; but he had since cleared up that chronological doubt. What happened was this—Captain Digby Murray, as was usual with the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, was visiting the out-ports, and was at Liverpool on official business. It happened that he was instructed to place himself in communication with the owners of the Eleanor at Cardiff, which had been prevented from going to sea. The owners had addressed an indignant letter to the Board of Trade complaining of this. These owners, a highly respectable firm at Liverpool, had a few days previously bought the ship without knowing what adventures she had gone through; they were not aware that in the hands of her former owners she had been condemned by the Board of Trade surveyors, and prohibited from proceeding to sea. Captain Murray was sent to Cardiff to re-survey the ship, with the view to seeing whether she could be safely sent to Liverpool for repairs, and the result was that he reported his opinion that she should not be allowed to leave Cardiff. It was this visit of Captain Murray to Cardiff and Swansea, from the 28th to the 31st of March, which the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) imagined had some connection with the visit of his agent, Mr. Hooker; but Captain Murray did not see the Collector of Customs nor give him any instructions. On the 24th of March, four days before the arrival of Captain Murray, the Collector of Customs informed the Board that extensive information had been asked for which was to be derived from a search in the Custom House Books, and the Collector asked for instructions before giving it. The Board replied on the 26th that the Collector was to acquaint Mr. Hooker that it was not usual to allow persons unconnected with the Department to inspect official books and documents; but, if the Government or the Royal Commission asked for information, it would be given immediately. This answer, after it had been given, was communicated to himself by the Customs, and he did not reverse it, because he thought it a proper one. It was not possible to authorize subordinate and local officers to give unlimited information to anyone who applied for it. Before the appointment of the Royal Commission he had told the hon. Member that if he wished for any information in addition to that he had already obtained, he should be most willing to do his best to obtain and furnish it. Now that the Royal Commission was appointed, any information the Board of Trade could obtain was absolutely at its disposal. So much for this Cardiff case. But he could not sit down without answering that which lay behind all the Questions of the hon. Member. They all seemed to be inspired by an idea that there was something wrong—some favouritism or want of integrity upon these matters at the Board of Trade. If there were to be whispers and insinuations of this kind he invited the fullest and most searching investigation. For himself, he wished to say that he had the most entire confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the permanent officials of the Board of Trade, and in the gentleman at the head of the Marine Department there, the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Gray, a man who knew more about ships and sailors than, perhaps, any other landsman in this country. ["Order!"] Mr. Gray had the sailors' interests as deeply at heart as any man in England, and had laboured zealously for years in a hundred ways for their benefit. Before sitting down he wished to put to the hon. Member for Derby a Question of which he had given him private Notice.

SIR JOHN HAY rose to Order. He wished to ask, whether some of the questions which had been stated in reply to the hon. Member were debatable; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman was in Order?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Derby asked a Question having reference to the conduct of the officers of the Board of Trade. Undoubtedly the House will be of opinion that the President of the Board of Trade, in answering a Question of this kind, is entitled to considerable indulgence. I am not prepared to say that the Question which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to ask is irregular before I hear what it is.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had confidence in the indulgence of the House in answering the Question, as the conduct of the permanent officials of the Board of Trade had been seriously called in question; and it was with the same motive and desire in order to protect the character of those gentlemen that he wished to ask the hon. Member for Derby a Question of which he had given him private Notice a few days previously. A report had appeared in a Liverpool paper which purported to give the hon. Member's exact words in a speech delivered in Exeter Hall. In the first paragraph were these words—

"There are people who represent us, or who ought to represent us, on the Board of Trade, who are wholly unsuspected, who would give half their fortune to promote wrecks. There is one man who has busied himself considerably in this way, but I will not mention names."

He hoped the hon. Member would say whether these were or were not the exact words which he had used. It was impossible to allow them to go forth to the country without asking the hon. Member to say publicly whether these were his words, because if such words, or anything resembling them, were to be used, he was prepared to ask—nay, to demand—the most rigorous investigation of such charges.

MR. PLIMSOLL: There is much wasted indignation on the question. The right hon. Gentleman asked me the question, and showed me the report a week ago, and I distinctly and immediately disavowed having used any such words, and called as my witnesses 20 or 25 Members of Parliament who heard me speak. All the papers which reported me on that occasion reported me accurately, except this one, and to this I wrote immediately the right hon. Gentleman spoke to me upon the subject, telling them of the error, and requesting that a correction should be made, which was at once done. It appears to me that was amply sufficient for all purposes of explanation; because, if every error which appears in a provincial newspaper is to be made a reason for putting an

hon. Member in loco penitentie to explain, we shall have nothing else to attend to, and no time for any other business.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—CONSTABLE GOODCHILD.—QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If any Order has been issued by the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police which in any way restrains members of the Metropolitan Police Force from making any payment to H. Goodchild in respect of certain expenses incurred by him when acting as secretary to the delegates of the Metropolitan Police Force?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM, in reply, said, that no order had been issued by the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police to restrain the members of the force from subscribing towards the expenses of the ex-officer Henry Goodchild, but there was a general order against police subscriptions. Application was made to the Chief Commissioner to allow the police to subscribe towards expenses of Goodchild, not as secretary to the delegates, but incurred by him subsequently to his dismissal; and it need not be pointed out what those expenses were, seeing that they were connected with the getting up of a meeting in Hyde Park. As these proceedings were not sanctioned and were improper, no official sanction could be given to the collection of subscriptions in respect of them. At the same time, the Chief Commissioner stated that if he were furnished with a correct statement of the expenses incurred previous to the dismissal of Goodchild, and of the moneys which had been subscribed and received by him for defraying those expenses, he would be happy to take the matter into consideration. No account had been furnished to the Commissioner. He might save the hon. Member the trouble of asking a second Question which stood on the Paper in his name—in reference to the chief constable of the Nottinghamshire constabulary destroying a poster which convened a meeting of Republicans—by saying that—

MR. AUBERON HERBERT rose to Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. Member to be answering a Question which is not yet put.

LANDLORD AND TENANT BILL.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO: Sir, with reference to a Question which I have placed upon the Paper, I wish to make an explanation. By the 12th clause of the Landlord and Tenant Bill which is to be introduced by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) any contract made by a tenant with his landlord after the passing of this Act, by virtue of which he may be deprived of any right or any claim which otherwise he might be entitled to make under this Act, shall, as far as it relates to such a claim, be void, both at Law and in Equity. It is currently reported that a great portion of the Conservative party, with the Leader of that party, have agreed either to oppose or not to oppose the second reading of the Bill in a certain event. There are two statements—one, that a determination unconditionally to oppose it has been resolved on, and another, that an understanding has been come to to withdraw the 12th clause.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the noble Lord was entitled to say anything with a view to make his Question clear; but the statement he was now making was not necessary for that purpose.

LORD ELCHO: My Question, Whether there is any understanding between the hon. Member for South Norfolk and any Members of the House that the Clause in the Landlord and Tenant Bill, which prohibits freedom of contract between landlord and tenant, is to be withdrawn?

MR. CLARE READ: I hope, Sir, to have the opportunity, by leave of the House, of stating my opinions of this Bill, and expatiating upon its merits, when it comes on for a second reading. I venture to think that this is rather an unusual Question for one Member to put to another. If it is any gratification to the noble Lord, I may say I know of no understanding between myself and any Member of this House in reference to any clauses of the Bill; but if there was an understanding I fear it would not disarm the hostility of the noble Lord, who was good enough to move the rejection of this Bill before it was printed.

POST OFFICE—EXPENDITURE FOR TELEGRAPH EXTENSIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Postmaster General, If he will state to the House out of what funds the Post Office authorities have defrayed the expenditure on account of Telegraph Extensions up to March 31st, which is believed to have amounted to about £800,000, and for which no provision has been made by Votes in Parliament?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, at the suggestion of the Committee on Public Accounts, of which my hon. Friend is an active member, an investigation is now going on into the matter to which his Question refers. The result of that investigation will be laid before the House, and I put it to my hon. Friend whether it would not be better to postpone any inquiry on the subject until that investigation is completed.

RATES FOR CHURCH REPAIRS, &c.

(SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, having regard to the promise he made to the House on the part of Her Majesty's Government in the Session of 1871, to bring in a Bill during the succeeding Session for the Abolition of all Compulsory Local Rates and Assessments for building and repairing churches and manses in Scotland, and seeing that the pressure of other business prevented this from being done last Session, whether he is now prepared to introduce the promised Bill, and at what date it may be expected to be brought in?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, the promise he made in 1871 was that he would give his best attention to the whole subject of Rates and Assessments in Scotland, for the purpose of amending and upholding ecclesiastical buildings, and that it was his intention in the course of that Session to introduce a measure upon the subject. But he also stated that with respect to such a measure—and also with respect to some other measures which were not merely in contemplation but were actually prepared—it was not advisable, with a view to their success, to introduce them into Parliament without some reasonable prospect of being able to pass them into law. No such opportunity had as yet occurred; but he was not without hope—a sanguine hope—that he might have such an opportunity during the present Session.

INDIA—THE KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.

QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he would state to the House, what amount of Booty was seized by General Whitlock's Force in January 1859, before the end of the war, in the house of one Muckhooned Rao Jamdar, in the captured town of Kirwee, and whether it was taken by the Government of India from the troops, and given back to Muckhooned Rao Jamdar while incarcerated as a rebel enemy in the gaol at Allahabad; whether the appropriation by the Provincial Government, without express licence from the Crown, of part of the Kirwee Booty, amounting in funded and other property to nearly £300,000 (Rupees 2,896,932 2 1,) is in conformity with the Law, or with the principle established under very high authority in the Deccan Case, and whether there has been any express grant of this Booty by Her Majesty, in whom it vests, to its present holders, to legalise the possession of it; and, whether the troops are not entitled, under the Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 65, s. 22, to have these and other disputed claims referred for a judicial instead of an arbitrary decision, and which was the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission appointed by Lord Palmerston in 1864?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to my hon. and gallant Friend's first Question I have to say that certain property was found and dealt with as he describes, but that such property was not "booty." In reply to his second Question I have to say that the appropriation by the Indian Government of the property which I suppose to be alluded to in that Question, but which is quite erroneously described as booty, was strictly in conformity with the law, and, further, that by law no express grant to the Indian Government was required. In reply to his third Question I have to say that the decision which was given by the Treasury after hearing counsel was final, and that no rights to the contrary accrue to any one either under the Act 3 & 4 Vic., c. 65, or under any other authority.

POST OFFICE—THE BOOK POST.

QUESTION.

MR. M'MAHON asked the Postmaster General, Why Inland Book Packets have since 1871 been reduced to "one foot six inches in length, nine inches in width, and six inches in depth," instead of "two feet in length and one foot in depth or width," the limit which has prevailed for many years, while for Book Packets for nearly all Foreign Countries, as well as for "Newspaper Packets" when intended for Inland circulation, the latter dimensions are still adhered to?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, the former dimensions were found to be very inconvenient for the Department, both in the conveyance and in the delivery of the packets, and the packets themselves were liable to be injured. For these reasons authority was obtained, when the Post Office Act of 1871 was passed, for reducing the dimensions. The rule as to book packets for foreign countries was not under discussion, and could not be altered without the consent of those countries. Newspapers have always had special privileges accorded to them, and they could not be brought under the same restrictions.

OFFICE OF MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN, for MR. JACOB BRIGHT, asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government propose to act on the unanimous Report of the 31st March from the Civil Services Expenditure Committee; and, if so, whether they will notify such intention to the new Master of the Rolls on his appointment?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the office of Master of the Rolls is vacant, and when the appointment is filled up—and that step cannot be long delayed—we shall take care that the proper course is taken in relation to the Report of the Committee.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—WRECK OF THE "ATLANTIC"—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he had to put to the President of the Board of Trade a Question of which he regretted having been unable to give him earlier Notice.

It was, Whether steps have been taken to inquire into the circumstances under which the "Atlantic" was lost on the coast of Nova Scotia? He put the Question particularly with reference to statements as to the circumstances which were said to have caused the attempt to put the "Atlantic" into Halifax on her way to New York.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: In all cases, Sir, of disaster happening to vessels in Colonial waters, under the Merchant [Shipping] Act, an inquiry is ordered by the Governor of the Colony, not directly by the Board of Trade. Such inquiry, I have every reason to believe, has been already ordered in this case.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—DECORATION OF THE CENTRAL HALL.

QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE said, he thought it would be interesting to the House if the First Commissioner of Works would explain the meaning of the specimen of the new encaustic work which had been put up in the Central Hall of the Houses of Parliament, and whether the right hon. Gentlemen was going to fill up the vacant niches with that specimen?

MR. AYRTON said, he was not able to magnify the specimen referred to into dimensions such as would fill the vacant niches, as the hon. Member had suggested. That specimen had been hung up because it had been produced by an eminent firm, who considered that they had discovered, and were able to carry on, a process of wall decoration which was perfectly indestructible, and would not be liable to any accidents such as had unfortunately befallen the frescoes on various walls of the Houses of Parliament. He thought it desirable, as the specimen in question was a copy from the original work, which had been put up in mosaic in the Central Hall, that the two should be hung up side by side, in order that those who took an interest in the subject might be enabled to compare one with the other, and see which produced the most agreeable effect—if anything particularly agreeable were produced by it. If those who were interested, and were able to form a good judgment upon this question, should think that the mode of decoration exhibited in the specimen was better than glass mosaic, then it would be open for consideration whether it might not be used instead, because it would possess this advantage—that it would represent ultimately the actual work of the artist, and not be a mere mechanical copy in small pieces of mosaic; and also this further advantage—that whereas for the work in the Central Hall £150 was paid to the artist who designed it, upwards of £500 was paid to the mechanics who exhibited it in the present form. That did not appear to him to be a mode of patronizing fine Art, although it might be a good way of patronizing mechanical art. It was, however, always understood that the walls of the Houses of Parliament should be made as available as possible for patronizing fine Art in this country, and he thought it desirable to find some means by which the works of artists could be painted on the walls in a durable manner. The painted frescoes had not succeeded, and by the deliberate decision of the House last Session it was determined in Committee of Supply, that no further attempt should be made to adorn the walls with fresco paintings. It was, therefore, necessary to find some other means of adorning, and they must either have works of art or mere mechanical devices, which might be new, or which might be a mere revival of the works of a semi-barbarous period of decoration.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT— TEACHERS.—QUESTION.

MR. GORDON asked the Vice President of the Council a Question, of which he had given him private Notice—Whether teachers who were examined at training colleges in Scotland since the Education (Scotland) Act came into operation, and who have successfully passed such examinations, are to be considered as the holders of certificates of competency in terms of the 56th section of that Act?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: My answer is a short one, but I hope it will prove a satisfactory one. I have to say Yes in reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman's inquiry.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—THE "MAGGIE."—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE asked what had been the result of the inquiry of the Home

Office with regard to the men imprisoned in Edinburgh gaol for refusing to proceed to sea in the "Maggie?"

MR. WINTERBOTHAM, in reply, said, that the Secretary of State having made inquiry, found no grounds for interfering in the case. There was no allegation of unseaworthiness. The vessel had been recently surveyed at Lloyd's and was found to be seaworthy. The only allegation was that the vessel was undermanned; but that had not been proved.

IRELAND—BELFAST ASSIZES—CASE OF MR. MALEESE—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN GRAY asked, Whether any information has been received at the Home Office with respect to the case of Mr. McAleese, the gentleman sentenced for contempt of Court at the Belfast Assizes to four months' imprisonment and the payment of a heavy fine; and whether it is the practice in England to treat persons sentenced for contempt of court in the same manner as persons convicted of criminal offences?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM in reply, said, he was not prepared to answer the latter part of the hon. Member's Question at present, and with regard to the case referred to, no information had reached the Home Office.

PARLIAMENT—THE EASTER VACA- TION—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

MR. GLADSTONE moved that the House at its rising do adjourn until Monday, the 21st April.

MR. G. BENTINCK wished to take advantage of this Motion for the purpose, in the first place, of making some remarks on the unsatisfactory mode in which the Business of the House was conducted, and, in the second place, of putting a Question. On Friday last, in answer to a Question which he put to the First Lord of the Admiralty, he was informed that the Navy Estimates would not be brought on after half-past 11 that night; but, looking to the state of the Business on the Paper, the right hon. Gentleman hoped that he would be able to go into them in the course of the evening. Accordingly, he and several other hon. Members waited in expectation that the Navy Estimates would be brought on. About a quarter-past eight, however, a supporter of the Government called attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present, and that being found to be the case, the House stood adjourned. Now, he thought that those hon. Members who had remained for the purpose of devoting their attention to the Navy Estimates had good ground for complaining that the Government did not take care that there should be a House for carrying on their own business on Friday night. But there was a still graver question connected with this matter. It would be in the recollection of the House that for some years past many successful attempts had been made to trench on the privileges of independent Members and to curtail the time at their disposal for introducing measures which they might think it right to bring forward. Whenever one of these attempts was made, the Prime Minister, who always supported them, did so on the ground of the growing Business of the House. Now, he (Mr. Bentinck) did not dispute the fact that the Business of the House had been growing. It had been growing rapidly and inconveniently. But that seemed to him to furnish an additional reason for complaining that when Supply was on the Paper, and it had been announced from the Treasury bench that the Navy Estimates would be brought on, the Government did not take the trouble to make a House for discussing them. They had heard a statement from the Government relating to the progress that was to be made with respect to Public Business after the recess, and that statement he could not help regarding as unsatisfactory. After the failure of the Government to keep a House on Friday evening they had had no announcement from the Government as to when the Navy Estimates were to be taken, and he should be glad to learn when there was any prospect of their being proceeded with.

Mr. GLADSTONE grieved to say that he himself was one of those against whom the hon. Member complained, as not being in the House on Friday night. He had a very good reason to give for his absence, having been unable to leave his bed the whole of that day. The hon. Member for West Norfolk had stated that the 32 or 33 Members of the Government, and no one else, were responsible for there not being 40 Members in the House. That, however, was straining a doctrine—which no doubt to some extent was applicable—too far, and if the hon. Member was conversant with the actual state of things with regard to keeping a House as far as the independent Members of the House were concerned, he would know that it was not always in the power of the Government to secure a House. The fact was, it could not be done. Such were the facilities for getting away from the House; such was the strength of social attraction to men of such social abilities as those possessed by Members of that House, and so limited were the means of getting back to the House at the command of Members who had got away, that the thing was impossible. He regretted these things very much, but they would happen from time to time. He did not by any means exempt the Government entirely from the responsibility of what occurred on Friday night, and it was a matter of very serious consideration with him, because such proceedings were becoming ridiculous. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would accept his assurance that the Government would always do their best to keep a House. The first place on the first day after the recess was pledged to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), and he was not satisfied that it would be for the convenience of the House to put down the Navy Estimates for the same evening. Otherwise, that course might be taken. But if it was not desirable, it would be still less desirable to postpone the Business connected with his right hon. Friend's financial proposals. They should be anxious to give the Navy Estimates the earliest place compatible with the arrangements he had mentioned.

Mr. NEWDEGATE, reverting to the circumstance of the "count out" on Friday said, he wished to make a remark that would strengthen the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck). He (Mr. Newdegate) was a member of the Committee on Public Business in 1861, and the change then made curtailing the opportunities for business at that time enjoyed by the unofficial Members of the House, was made upon the distinct understanding, that the Government would keep a House on Friday. That was the condition, indeed, upon which unofficial Members gave up their right to Thursday. The arrangement was that Supply should be put down first among the Orders of the Day on Fridays, even though no Supply was required; and the condition was that the Government should keep a House on Friday night. He must be allowed to say, then, when unofficial Members were taunted with having accumulated so large a quantity of business, that it could not be transacted, they had a right to refer to the "count out" on Friday as an instance in which the Government had added to their embarrassment.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINOK said, he thought the inconvenience might be averted by the Prime Minister placing a pressure upon his own particular partizans not to count out a Member of the Government. A practice had arisen during recent years of counting out Ministers, which was not only detrimental to the public service but which brought the proceedings of the House to a mere farce. He would give three instances to support his allegation. On a late occasion an hon. Member had a Motion which had a great deal to do with the regulation of the Metropolis, and when he had completed his statement and the Home Secretary was about to reply, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. R. Shaw), one of the supporters of the Government, rose and caused the House to be counted out. The other day the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) submitted a Motion touching the important subject of collisions of ships at sea, and the President of the Board of Trade was in the middle of a speech in reply when the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Chadwick) rose in his place, and simply from spite, he having been counted out himself ["Order"]—

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he was transgressing the Rules of the House.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK begged at once to withdraw the expression. He believed the word "retaliation" had been used by the hon. Member on a former occasion. But, at any rate, the hon. Member for Macclesfield had the President of the Board of Trade counted out. On Friday night the hon. and learned Member for Dowsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) made a statement of great importance affecting the treatment of British subjects abroad; but before any answer could be given by the Government the House was again counted out. He was bound to say that the Conservative counts-out were always made with great judgment, and if that example was followed by the advanced Members of the Liberal party, there would be less waste of the public time in future.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday, 21st April.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

WAYS AND MEANS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT—COMMITTEE.

WAYS AND MEANS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Bonham Carter, — The financial year which has just come to a close has been by no means exempt from incidents and vicissitudes. We have had what I fear must be characterized as an unfavourable harvest. Two of the States which, together with us, formed the barrier of Europe against the Atlantic, are at this moment provisionally governed, and one of them seems to be in the throes of a civil war. If we turn in another direction, we find that the monetary world has been very much agitated, and that apprehensions have been excited by the very large remittances of money which have taken place from France to Germany; and, in addition to that, we have had at home the self-inflicted misery of strikes to contend with, besides a great rise in the price of all the necessaries of life, more especially in that greatest necessary in our cold and damp climate—coal. But I think that any one who attends to the narrative which I am about to lay before the House will not be able to trace the slightest vestige of any ill effect which those different vicissitudes and misfortunes have had upon the revenue and finances of the country. Things which in former years would have produced the most active effect seem now almost powerless. It really looks as though the wind that could bow the sapling were harmless against the oak—as if our finances, our business, our commerce, our trade, by the immense expansion which has taken place, have gained in solidity, and are more difficult to be moved, just because they are larger than before. I trust it will prove so. At any rate, my task this year is a very gratifying one—namely, to detail the financial results of a year of almost unexampled prosperity.

The first point to which I will draw the attention of the House is the comparison of the Expenditure of the year which has just elapsed—1872-3—with the total Grants within that year. By the words “total Grants,” I understand the Grants which were made in the Appropriation Act, together with the Supplemental Estimates which were granted in the current year. Now, the total Grant of the year 1872-3 amounted to £71,881,000, and the actual Expenditure of the year amounted to £70,714,000. So that the actual Expenditure is less than the actual Grants by a sum of £1,167,000, and less than the amount granted in the Appropriation Act by £949,000, and less than the total original estimate in the Budget by £599,000.

I now proceed to mention some of the principal items of this saving. The first is a sum of £205,000 unexpended money—Charges on the Consolidated Fund. That arises in this manner:—By the Act of 1869, by which the Chancery and Bankruptcy balances were transferred and paid into the Exchequer, provision was contained to the effect that, in case the funds fell below a certain sum, a Grant should be made in aid of them from the Consolidated Fund. We have had to make such a Grant since the Act was passed, and a sum of £100,000 was put down for that purpose. Happily, however, the fund has been sufficient, and the Grant has not, therefore, been called on. Another cause is somewhat similar in its nature. By the Telegraph Act, also of 1869, it was enacted, that if the Telegraph revenue should show a profit, that profit should be expended in the purchase of stock, and £100,000 was put down to meet such an expenditure. The fact, however, was that this expenditure was only £11,000, and so far there is a saving of £89,000:—making a total saving of £205,000 on the Consolidated Fund. Again, the Civil Service Estimates show a very large reduction indeed—amounting to no less than £766,000. This arises principally on two heads—the one Education, the other Public Buildings. In respect of the first, the Education Department seem to have believed that the Act of 1870 would come more rapidly into effect than it has done, and they made provision accordingly, which has not been called upon. That, I may say, in passing, is only in accordance with my own experience. An error which people are very likely to fall into is this—that because a change is made the change which is expected and desired can be at once brought about. According to my experience, it is a matter of great time, labour, and care, to bring a new system of any kind to maturity. Twenty years of excessive labour were devoted by able men to the old system, and I think we must not be too sanguine in expecting that the new scheme shall arrive at the point we should like to see it attain, until, at any rate, several years have elapsed.

Then, with respect to public buildings, there is a considerable amount—about £300,000—of unexpended money. The chief buildings on which this money has been saved are the Post Office and Inland Revenue Offices, and the Natural History Building connected with the Science and Art Department. On this subject the Committee on Public Accounts have made what I think is a very valuable suggestion. They point out that very large surrenders are often made in this Department—amounting in 1869 to £260,000; in 1870 to £279,000; in 1871 to £243,000; and in 1872 to £305,000. And they point out how this happens. They say that the necessity of repaying into the Exchequer the unexpended balance of each Vote on the Civil Service Estimates causes their framers in each Department to insert in the Estimates outside amounts beyond what are required. Experience, they say, shows that though each calculation may be specifically justifiable, the collective amounts are, from various causes, always more than is spent, and this suggests a system of transfer from one building to another, somewhat similar to that adopted in the Appropriation Act with reference to the Army and Navy. That suggestion is worthy of consideration, and to it we will endeavour to give effect. In the Post Office Department there is an excess of Expenditure of £24,000, and in the Telegraph Department of £172,000. The Public Accounts Committee report that the excess is due to the rapid and unforeseen expansion of telegraphic business during the year. I think that in future it would be better that Supplemental Estimates should be moved for any excesses of this kind than that they should be allowed to run on to the end of the year.

I have now compared the actual Expenditure of the past year—1872-3—with the Grants of the year, and it may be worth while to compare the Expenditure of 1872-3 with that of 1871-2. The Expenditure of 1871-2 was £71,490,000; that of 1872-3 was £70,714,000, showing a decrease of £776,000 in the Expenditure of last year as compared with the year preceding it. There was a decrease of expenditure on the Army of £1,055,000; the Navy, £358,000; the Miscellaneous Civil Services, £187,000; the Consolidated Fund charges £222,000, and on the National Debt of £34,000; making in all £1,856,000. There has been an increase of expenditure in only two items—namely, for the abolition of Purchase £606,000—which I need hardly say, is quite out of the control of the Treasury—and in the Revenue Department £575,000, arising mainly from the great extension of the Post Office and Telegraph Departments; making the net decrease £675,000.

I now proceed to compare the Revenue of the year 1872-3 with the Estimate of that year. The Estimate was £71,846,000; the actual Revenue for the year has been £76,608,000, so that there was an increase of Revenue over Estimate of £4,762,000. The Expenditure, as I have stated, for the year was £70,714,000, and subtracting one of these amounts from the other, we find a surplus of Income over Expenditure for the year which has just expired of £5,894,000. Of this Revenue there were derived from sources other than taxes—from the Post Office, Telegraphs, Crown Lands, Fees, and Miscellaneous—£10,191,000, so that the residue alone was derived from taxation. The Customs have, I find, increased by the large amount of £953,000. In fact, there has been an increase in every item of Customs' revenue with the exception of coffee, chicory, Geneva, and molasses. Coffee produced, in the financial year to the 31st of March, 1872, £362,000; but in the year just expired, owing to the reduction of duty, it produced only £204,000; and chicory, which in 1871-2 produced £104,000, in 1872 produced only £73,631. In the month of May there was an enormous increase of consumption, and every month except September shows an increase over the corresponding month of the previous year. The Returns are very gratifying; because it has always been said that coffee was an article which it was no use relieving from taxation, since the people of England could not make it, and did not like the trouble of having anything to do with it—and, in point of fact, it was not a national beverage. But certainly the result, so far as I can learn, has shown the contrary. The increase in the consumption of coffee was estimated at 7 per cent, but it has been 11·8 per cent. This is a little remarkable, because there was a rise in price in the year of 17 per cent. In the year before there had been a decline of 11 per cent in consumption. The loss on coffee was estimated at about £165,000; but in the face of these adverse circumstances it has proved to be only £157,000. The result of the change of duty, taking Customs and Excise, coffee and chicory together, may be stated thus:—the actual revenue for 1871-2 was £479,000, as compared with an estimated revenue of £495,000. For coffee and chicory the estimate for 1872-3 was £265,000, but the actual revenue was £273,000. It is pretty plain, therefore, that I was right in thinking that coffee was over-taxed with respect to tea, and that it only required to be placed on a level with it for the consumption to increase. The increase in Customs Duties has been—in spirits, £357,000; in tobacco, £253,000; in tea, £129,000; in wine, £37,000; and in sugar and molasses, £85,000.

I now turn to the Excise. The Revenue from Excise in the year just expired has been £2,475,000 in excess of the Estimate, spirits showing an increase over the previous year of £1,330,000, making the total receipts from spirits £13,600,000. The increased consumption has continued throughout the year, and at the rate of £25,000 per week. During the six months, April to September, it was at the rate of £30,000 per week, and in the last six months it was at the rate of £20,000 per week. It is impossible to make such a statement as this without very mixed feelings. On the one hand, we cannot help thinking to what much better use the greatest part of the money, only a small portion of which is represented by these enormous totals, might have been put; on the other hand, we cannot but in some degree rejoice that the state of the working classes has enabled them to make this expenditure, although they might have spent the money in so much better a way. I now come to Malt, the increase on which is also very large. The increase of revenue in 1872-3 over 1871-2 is £866,000; but of this £400,000 is due to exceptional circumstances. It arises from a late malting in 1871-2, and an early malting in 1872-3. The real increase in quantity of malt made is represented by the respectable figure of £466,000. The licences, which have not been progressive lately, show an increase of £148,000. Stamps also show a remarkable increase over the estimate of £247,000, while as compared with last year's produce Deeds show an increase of £105,000—although you remember that the reduction on Stamps was very considerable—Bills of Exchange of £110,000, Receipts and Drafts of £40,000, Marine Insurance of £12,000, Probates and Administrations of £75,000, and Fee Stamps of £10,000, making altogether £352,000. But that has been compensated by a falling off in Stamp Duties which are not under the control of the Government, and perhaps it is not desirable that they should be—I mean the Legacy Duties, amounting to £190,000. But it should also be remembered that the amount of Legacy Duty in the year 1871-2 was the largest on record—namely, £3,371,000. The Income Tax shows an increase over the estimate of £560,000.

I now come to the comparison of the Revenue in 1872-3 with that in 1871-2. In 1872-3 it was £76,609,000; in 1871-2 it was £74,708,000, showing an increase of £1,901,000; and this, though taxes have been remitted calculated to produce a loss of £3,240,000 within the year.

I have now to turn to another subject—the state of the Exchequer Balances. We are responsible for four financial years, from the 1st of April, 1869, to the 31st of March, 1873. On the 1st of April, 1869, the balance in the Exchequer was £4,707,000. There has been a surplus of revenue over ordinary expenditure during the four years of £16,079,000, and an excess of repayments of loans for public works over advances of £2,169,000, making together £22,895,000. Out of that sum there has been applied directly to the extinction of Debt £10,903,000, leaving a balance on the 31st of March, 1873, of £11,992,000.

This brings me to the question of the Debt. Between April, 1869, and April, 1873, we have paid off Debt to the amount of £29,633,000; but during the same period we have incurred Debt for Telegraphs £8,668,000, and for Fortifications £1,285,000, making together £9,953,000. Subtracting that sum from the £29,633,000, there remains a net diminution of Debt of £19,680,000. The Committee should observe that the Debt incurred for Telegraphs—£8,668,000—is not money sunk, but represents reproductive expenditure, so that, in truth, we have not been far from reducing the Debt by the large sum I first mentioned. On the 1st of April, 1869, the total Debt of all kinds, Funded, Unfunded, and Terminable Annuities, was £805,480,000. On the 1st April, 1873, it had been reduced to £785,800,000, it being composed as follows:—Funded Debt, £727,425,000; capital value of Terminable Annuities in Three per Cent Stock, £53,546,000 (42,000,000 of which I think I am correct in stating will drop in 1885); and Unfunded Debt—namely, Exchequer Bills—for we have no Exchequer Bonds out—£4,829,000, making a total of £785,800,000. The Debt has been reduced within the current year by £6,861,000. I will give a few figures showing what I may call our capital expenditure during the last four years. During that time we have spent in Fortifications and Telegraphs, £9,028,000; in the Abolition of Purchase, £1,285,000; we have diminished the Debt by £19,680,000, and we have increased the balance in the Exchequer by £7,285,000, making altogether a balance of capital expenditure for permanent objects of £37,279,000. During the same four years taxation has been remitted amounting to £9,166,000—which I hope will be an answer to those who accuse us of having devoted our attention wholly to the reduction of Debt and of having done nothing to alleviate the burdens of the people.

I now turn to the financial year on which we are entering, and compare the estimated Expenditure for that year with the Grants of 1872-3. The estimated Expenditure for the current year is £71,871,000, and the Grants of 1872-3 were £71,881,000; showing a net decrease of £10,000. There is a reduction of charge on Debt of £80,000, arising from the cancelling a large amount of stock, and a reduction of Exchequer Bills over £300,000. On the other hand, there have been loans raised by Terminable Annuities for Fortifications, and Barracks. The Charges on the Consolidated Fund are reduced by £210,000, which is a counterpart of the statement I made to the House at an earlier period of the Session. We have not thought it necessary to estimate the balance of the funds in the Courts of Bankruptcy and Chancery. There is no need to apprehend a call, and we have not estimated for them. On the other hand, we have not thought it necessary to place £100,000, or any other sum, in order to provide for profit on Telegraphs. The Army Expenditure, as the Committee have heard from my right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell), is £407,000 less than in the past year, the chief decrease being £350,000 in warlike stores. There is an increase on fuel and provisions of nearly £400,000. On the Navy there is an increase of £341,000. There is an increase in the Dockyards through the increase of Wages of £136,000, also an increase of £144,000 in Naval Stores, and an increase on Steam Machinery of £132,000, making together with various other items £475,000. The increased cost of coal is estimated at £60,000. The Civil Services show an estimated increase of £127,000. There is a decrease in Class 1 on a number of buildings now in hand; but an increase on the Natural History Museum and the New Courts of Justice, both buildings which we are now seriously about to commence. We have only recently received the estimate for the New Law Courts, and I do not think that any time has yet been lost in that matter. In Class 2 there is an increase of £107,000, due to an increase in the Local Government Board estimate caused by the Public Health Act, and in the Home Office estimate caused by the Mines' Regulation Act. In Class 3 there is an increase of £131,000, wholly attributable to increase of pay to the police. There is an increase for the Dublin Constabulary, in consequence of the Report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry. There is also an increase of the Metropolitan and County police of England. Industrial Schools also exhibit an increase, which, I apprehend, will continue so long as those institutions are conducted under an Act so loosely drawn as the present one. On the other hand, Criminal Prosecutions, Reformatories, and County Prisons show a decrease, which is, of course, gratifying. In Class 4 Education shows a decrease of £100,000; which is owing to the fact that I have already mentioned—namely, that the Act does not come so rapidly into effect as was anticipated. Science and Art and Education in Ireland show an increase. Class 5 is practically stationary. There is some decrease in the charge for Colonial Establishments, while for the Diplomatic Service and for the Zanzibar Mission there is an increase. In the Revenue Departments the Customs and Inland Revenue show an increase of £40,000, arising from the new assessment to the Income Tax. In the Post Office there is an increase of £135,000, attributable to the progress of the Service, and the Telegraphs exhibit an increase of £145,000, due to the same cause; the revenue being estimated to increase in larger proportion.

I now proceed to submit to the House the estimate of the Revenue for the year 1873-4, as compared with the actual Revenue for 1872-3. The actual Revenue for 1872-3 was £76,608,770. The estimated Revenue for the year 1873-4 is £76,617,000; so that there is an increase over the actual Revenue of last year of £8,230. We take the Customs at the same amount as they produced last year—namely, £21,033,000. The Excise we estimate to yield £25,747,000, or £38,000 less than last year. That decrease is, I apprehend, accounted for by what I have already mentioned about an apparent great rise in malt. The Stamps we take at £10,050,000, being an increase of £103,000. The Land Tax and the House Duty we take at £2,350,000, or £13,000 more than they yielded in 1872-3. The Income Tax we take at £7,000,000. It yielded £7,500,000 last year, the difference of £500,000 being, of course, accounted for by the relics of the higher rate we had before. The Post Office we take at £5,012,000, showing an increase of £192,000; the Telegraph Service we estimate to produce £1,220,000, showing an increase of £205,000; the Crown Lands we take at the same amount as last year—namely, £375,000, and the Miscellaneous we estimate at £3,830,000, being an increase of £33,230 over last year. The total estimated Revenue for 1873-4 is £76,617,000, being an increase of £8,230 over the actual Revenue of 1872-3. The Customs, as I have said, are put at the same figure as last year. The Excise we estimate to produce a total of £25,747,000, divided under the following heads:—chicory, £7,000, licences, £3,880,000; malt, £6,980,000; racehorses, £10,000; railways, £520,000; spirits, £14,200,000; sugar, £150,000;—total, £25,747,000. The estimate for spirits is taken at a considerable advance over last year, it having been observed that the revenue from this source has of late years advanced steadily and almost in the same ratio, or about £700,000 a-year. In 1866, when my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he called attention to the large yield under the heads of Customs and Excise, and stated that £13,955,000 from spirits was the largest sum ever raised in any period of our history by a tax on a single commodity. Well, the estimated income for the ensuing year from spirits under the heads of Customs and Inland Revenue is £19,000,000. The Income Tax we estimate will produce £7,000,000; that is, £1,750,000 for every penny. When the late Sir Robert Peel first imposed the Income Tax, he estimated, taking an average of years, that it would yield £728,000 for each penny. So that the result of 30 years of experience, and I hope of the improvement of the tax has been that it now yields £1,000,000 for every penny more than it did in 1842.

It now remains for me to balance the two sides of the account. The Income for the year 1873-4, as I have stated, will be £76,617,000; the Expenditure we estimate at £71,871,000—showing a surplus of £4,746,000. I have already informed the Committee that the Balances in the Exchequer approach very closely upon £12,000,000.

Now, the question arises, what are we to do with all this money? The first subject which must be in everybody's mind, and which, therefore, I will deal with first, is the damages in which we have been cast by the Arbitrators at Geneva. Their amount, as far as we can tell by reducing American money into English, is £3,200,000, which we are to pay before the 1st of October next in gold at Washington. [Mr. WHITE: The date in the Award is the 14th of September.]

It will have to be paid in gold. This appears to me, I confess, to be the service of the present year. Some people, as I have observed, have attempted to make out that, seeing the Arbitration occurred last year, it may be said in some degree to belong to last year. But I hold it to be an indubitable principle that nobody pays debts before he is obliged, and as we are not obliged to pay before the 1st of October next, it is in the year in which that fatal day arrives that our duties accrue in this matter. I, therefore, regard this as undoubtedly a charge not on the year that has gone by, but on the year that is now before us. But while I state this I am also quite free to admit that this does not necessarily settle the question of the manner in which this large sum is to be met. It is quite true that it is a charge on the year, but it is also true that it is a charge entirely sui generis, and that it has never happened to us before, although I am quite willing to say I hope it may happen again—[“Oh, oh!”]—at least, I hope the chance of it may occur again by the reference of some future difference which may arise to arbitration. So large a payment, however, undoubtedly interferes with our ordinary finance; but it interferes with it not as a permanent payment, but as one that comes once and that may never recur. We have taken these matters into our consideration, and we are of opinion that, on the whole, it is our duty to place one-half of this payment upon the ordinary revenue of the present year. That will be the sum of £1,600,000. As to the rest of the sum—namely, another £1,600,000—we think that we ought to provide for its payment, without any further resort to the taxation of the year, by asking for power to give Exchequer Bonds or Exchequer Bills for the amount, in case—which I do not at all anticipate—of an unfavourable state of the finances. By that means we have disposed, therefore, of £1,600,000 of our surplus. There remains £3,146,000; and the question is, how are we to dispose of that sum? We have carefully considered the matter, and we have come to the conclusion that it is our duty to propose a remission of taxation on some articles which enter very generally into the food of the people, and in that way to give the greatest and most general relief. After having weighed as well as we could the claims of different articles, we have come to the conclusion that the article on which it was desirable that we should fix was sugar. There were a great many taxes which one would be exceedingly anxious to reduce; but there was scarcely one which enters so widely into the comforts of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects—from the highest to the lowest—as sugar. It is a sweetener which enters into all sorts of food; it is the delight of children, and the solace of age. With all these admirable qualities, it is exceedingly nutritious and wholesome, constituting really and truly an article of food. We are also very much encouraged by the result of former reductions to proceed further in this direction. The sugar duty in 1872-3 produced £3,252,000, that being a very considerable recovery from the sum which was taken off in 1870. We are now asking you to make this reduction chiefly on one ground, but there are others on which I need not enlarge which may be taken into account. The reduction of the duty in 1870 has brought into more conspicuous view a set of questions with which I confess I, for one, was very little conversant before, and on which I would wish to be allowed to say a few words. Nothing, perhaps, has been legislated about so minutely as sugar. It is divided into five different scales, the first being under the head of refined and the others of unrefined sugar. To each of these scales a different value is attached. Before 1865 the highest scale of refined sugar was, I think, taxed at 18s. per cwt, and the lowest at 12s. My right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Gladstone) in 1865 reduced the tax on the highest to 12s., and on the lowest, if I am not mistaken, to 8s. per cwt. In 1870 the House reduced the tax again to 6s. and 4s., so that as we reduced the tax we gradually reduced the range within which the five scales I have mentioned operated. In other words, we left the same number of stairs as before, but then they were not so steep. The effect of these reductions has been very considerable, and, so far as they have gone, I think that they have proved very beneficial. There are not only five different scales of duty for sugar, without counting molasses, but seven different scales of drawback for one class—that is, refined sugar. This drawback is not paid upon raw sugars, but it is paid on refined sugar. The great object in estimating the drawback was to ascertain how the sugar was refined. This process gives rise to innumerable practices, which I will not call by any harsh terms, but which are called by harsh names by our lively neighbours across the Channel. Without going into details, I may say that the effect of these practices was that what Parliament intended to be given as a drawback became very different, and the Revenue was greatly injured. The effect of the change no doubt diminished this injury. The difference was not so great as to make it worth a man's while to dress the sugar up so as to make it look of a different class to what it really was in order to obtain the drawback. This tended very much to make the drawback what it was intended to be—a re-imbursment of duty instead of a bounty upon the exportation of the article. Gentlemen connected with the trade have come to me and complained very much of having been injured by the change—the bounty being so small there was not the same room for profit. I hold this to be an excellent result of what has been already done, and we think that matters in this respect may be further improved if the House will listen to our proposal to diminish the scale still further, leaving the scale itself as it exists; indeed, we have not the power of altering it, because we are bound to it by Treaty on that subject. But the several scales will be so near each other that it will not, probably, be worth the while of anyone to take much trouble in order to get more in the shape of a bounty than he would have to pay in duty, and the Revenue will thus be more fairly treated. The reduction, I may add, which we propose is, to take off again half the duty on sugar as before. The duty for the present year—1872-3—is £3,252,000, and the half of that sum is £1,626,000. We believe, however, that the increased consumption would give us £1,822,000, and that the loss to the Revenue, therefore, would be only £1,430,000. I may mention, while on this subject, that we propose the reduced duty should not come into effect until the 8th of May, so that time may be given to those who hold stocks of sugar to get rid of them. [Mr. CRAWFORD: Hear, hear!] We have no inclination to enter into another discussion with my hon. Friend the Member for the City of London, and after the cheer with which he has just received my proposal, I hope he will not come forward again as one of those evil counsellors who may be disposed to contend that further time should be given. The precise rates of duty will be found in the Resolution which I will propose, and it will be sufficient to state now that the highest rate on refined sugar will be 3s. per cwt; on the first class, 2s. 10d.; on the second, 2s. 8d.; on the third, 2s. 5d.; on the fourth, 2s.; and on molasses, 10d. Well, we have still something left, and I will not keep the House in suspense one moment on the subject. What we propose to do is to take a penny off the Income Tax. There has been considerable agitation against this tax, to which, however, we have felt it to be our duty to offer the firmest opposition. The fact is, we are in no position to get rid of the tax—at least in the present state of our finances. Nor are we in a position, as I have often argued, to break down the integrity of the tax by treating one Schedule in a different manner from another. We have no choice but to retain it; but we are anxious to act as fairly as we can towards all parts of the community; and having given great remissions in the shape of indirect taxation, we wish also to relieve, as far as possible, the large classes that come under direct taxation. There is also another reason for the proposal which we make which is not quite so obvious. When Sir Robert Peel imposed the Income Tax in 1842, the tax, which was then 7d. in the pound, yielded, I think, £7,100,000, or about £100,000 more than the present amount. [Mr. DISRAELI: Without Ireland.] At present a tax of 3d. in the pound would yield as much as a tax of 7½d. would yield in the days of Sir Robert Peel, and we are therefore maintaining the amount of the tax as nearly as possible at its original level, while we are diminishing the number of pence in the pound. In consequence of the proposed reduction there will be a loss this year of £1,425,000. I have also to mention another small matter—I allude to a reduction of £30,000 which we propose, by extending the exemption for servants to persons employed by hotel keepers, and persons keeping houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors. They have made out, I think, a good case, because they have hitherto been charged for their servants under circumstances which have caused other trades to be exempted. I had no sufficient answer to give to their argument, and therefore I give them this £30,000. I may also observe that the reduction of the duty on sugar will cause an increase of £30,000 to the Excise, because the Excise demand a large sum for a certain amount of sugar used for the purpose of protecting malt, and the lower duty now paid to the Customs would be paid to the Excise. Setting that sum against the £30,000 by which the Excise will be diminished by the remission of the tax on the servants of hotel keepers, the amount of the Excise duties will remain unaltered.

I will now state to the House the result of these changes. The Customs will be diminished, by the remission of half the sugar duties, to £19,603,000. The Excise will remain as it is, having lost £30,000 and gained £30,000. The Income Tax will be reduced from £7,000,000 to £5,575,000; and the Expenditure will be augmented by £1,600,000 on account of the payment of the Alabama Indemnity. Thus the estimated Revenue will stand at £73,762,000, against an Expenditure of £73,471,000, leaving a surplus Income over Expenditure of £291,000.

To sum up briefly what we have done, I may say that we hope to pay during this year the amount of the Alabama Indemnity, £3,200,000. [An hon. MEMBER: Half that amount.] No, we hope to pay—in fact, we must pay—the whole of that amount during the year; we hope to reduce the National Debt by £6,000,000; we shall lend £1,000,000 in excess of payments in respect of Public Works, and we shall remit taxation to the amount of £2,835,000.

I trust these Estimates will be satisfactory to the Committee and that hon. Members will think that the Government have acted in a spirit of fairness and equality to all parties. We have been anxious to hold the balance as evenly as we could between direct and indirect taxation, and to consult, as far as we could, the wishes and interests of every portion of the community. We believed that we could not listen to the request to take off the Income Tax altogether, but we have endeavoured to make the burden more tolerable; and we believe that in reducing the tax upon sugar, we shall not only largely relieve the consumers of that article, but also strike a vital blow at a very objectionable system that has grown up of giving bounties under the form of drawbacks. While they have done their best to relieve the taxpayers, the Government have not been unmindful of the duty resting upon them to reduce the Debt as far as they were able. During the present year we have paid off £6,800,000 of Debt. There are, I believe, some who murmur at our having devoted such a large sum towards the payment of the Debt. I hope, however—and indeed I believe—that those who hold that opinion are in a small minority, and that they will continue to be in a minority, for I am perfectly satisfied that whenever this nation shall arrive at a point when it shall lose its feeling for the corporate unity of the nation, and shall come to regard individual comfort as of more importance than the welfare and the well-being of the State, and shall consult merely the wishes and the convenience of the present generation; when we shall adopt the witty and worthless maxim—"That as posterity has done nothing for us, it is our duty to do nothing for posterity"—we shall not be far from the edge of that abyss into which so many States and Empires have been precipitated by self-seeking and sordid purposes. It only now remains for me to move the Resolution, fixing the Income Tax at 3*d.* in the pound.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for one year, commencing on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, for and in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act passed in the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, for granting to Her Majesty Duties on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices, the following Rates and Duties (that is to say):

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of all such Property, Profits, and Gains (except those chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act), the Rate or Duty of Three Pence;

And for and in respect of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value thereof;

In England, the Rate or Duty of One Penny Halfpenny; and

In Scotland and Ireland respectively the Rate or Duty of One Penny Farthing;

Subject to the provisions contained in section twelve of the Act of thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth Victoria, chapter twenty, for the exemption of Persons whose whole Income from every source is under One Hundred Pounds a-year, and relief of those whose Income is under Three Hundred Pounds a-year."

MR. HUNT wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman how long he proposed that the Exchequer Bills in respect of the remaining half of the Alabama Indemnity should run?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: We hope that we shall not have to make use of the Exchequer Bills at all; but if we are compelled to have recourse to them they will only be for short dates, and in that case the operation would have the practical effect of deferring the payment of the remaining half of the Indemnity until next year.

MR. WHITE said, it had been for some years his practice to follow the Chancellor of the Exchequer on these occasions, and to make certain stringent, although not ungenerous comments, upon his Financial Statement. On every former occasion he had ventured to point out that the right hon. Gentleman had systematically under-estimated the incoming Revenue—as its out-turn uniformly proved—to the extent of some millions per annum. This year, however, it was quite otherwise, so all he could do was to express his satisfaction at the speech to which they had just listened, and which, he believed, would be generally approved. The Income Tax had lately attracted rather a large share of the odium which was inseparable from direct taxation; but he believed that this display of opposition in certain localities had been caused, thanks to the right hon. Gentleman, in a great degree—as the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue alleged in their last Report—by its having been suddenly raised in 1871 from 4*d.* to 6*d.* in the pound. In dividing his available surplus between direct and indirect taxation—reducing the Income Tax to 3*d.* and taking off half the sugar duty—the right hon. Gentleman had adopted the fairest and wisest course under existing circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman must, however, forgive him if he could not join with him in exulting over the large reduction that had been made in the amount of the National Debt during the past year. In thus reducing the Debt £6,000,000, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had in some degree trespassed upon the domain of Parliament, without whose consent, by means of his under-estimating the accruing Revenue, this large sum had been surreptitiously appropriated for that purpose. The question of the propriety of permitting any Chancellor of the Exchequer to exercise such a power as this was one that well deserved the serious and early attention of Parliament. That distinguished and enlightened statesman, the late Lord Grenville, had said in 1827—

"To determine whether any or what portion of national wealth shall at any time be withdrawn by taxation from private use for the reduction of the National Debt is not a question of abstract science. No decision can more essentially depend upon the contingent and fluctuating considerations of ever-varying circumstances. None, therefore, can be fitter to be reserved for the annual consideration of a wise and cautious Legislature."

In 1855 the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government—questioning the policy of any Parliament dictating or uniformly following some prescribed or anterior rule for the appropriation of public moneys in liquidation of National Debt—used these words—

"Upon what principle was the Parliament of 1855 to say that £1,000,000 a-year must be applied in a particular way by the Parliament of 1860 or 1870? They were there to find supplies and money to meet the national exigencies for our own times, and not for the time of our children. That was not their business. . . . Parliament would do much better to rest satisfied with the performance of its own duty, and not undertake to lay down a particular policy for a future Parliament."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii. 1634.]

The Public Accounts Committee had recommended that the whole system of the appropriation of any accruing Surplus of Income over the Expenditure to the payment of the National Debt should now be revised. The right hon. Gentleman was himself aware that the present system was obviously delusive. The large amount in the past year of the Excise Duties might be attributed to a great increase of the expenditure of the people. Many of the working classes now received higher wages, which enabled them to increase their comforts. If the agricultural labourers were paid at a reasonable rate we should see a still greater augmentation of the Excise Revenue. If their wages were increased

3s. per week he believed that would lead to an annual increase in the Excise returns of quite £2,000,000. Our financial prosperity was intimately associated with the earnings of the working classes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had talked exultingly of the diminution of our Debt. What was the amount of that National Debt? Why, it was £786,000,000; but if it were now as much as £800,000,000, it would still be less than the total amount of the National Income. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer did abolish £25,000,000 of the National Debt, the interest that would be saved by that abolition amounted—it should be remembered—to less than a half-penny in the pound of the Income Tax at present. He (Mr. White) need not say that if £25,000,000 had been appropriated to the further remission of taxation on tea, sugar, coffee, and other articles of domestic consumption, it would have led to an enormous increase of our foreign trade and home industry, and, moreover, must have diffused increased enjoyment and comfort in every household, however humble, throughout the land.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he would have abstained from offering any remarks on the Statement of the right hon. Gentleman if he had not on the Paper a Notice of Motion with regard to the malt tax. Upon a former occasion he had "run Malt against Sugar," that was the term popularly applied to it. That was when the present Prime Minister was Chancellor of the Exchequer that he brought forward that Motion; but he had not the sympathy of the House with him then, for he was beaten by something like 3 to 1 in the division which took place upon the question. He understood that the amount of duty which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to take off sugar was £1,430,000. Although that was a considerable sum, yet, having regard to the amount that was now raised by the malt tax, he (Colonel Bartelot) did not think it would be wise or prudent when the Resolution to effect that reduction was put to the House to run malt against sugar. This much, however, he would venture to say—that, although no Chancellor of the Exchequer of late years had ever attempted to deal with the question, except his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), yet no hon. Member had ever asserted in his place in that House that the malt tax was a fair and a just tax. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to deal with the malt tax as he dealt with the sugar duty, the result would be exactly analogous—there would be a better class of beer throughout the country, and the revenue would not be diminished. Therefore, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to have passed by in silence the claim with reference to the malt tax. Notwithstanding the influential deputations which had appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he did not vouchsafe to say a word on the subject on this occasion. He was afraid the agricultural interest was not one which much interested the right hon. Gentleman, because on previous occasions it had been entirely ignored by him. As to the income tax, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had fairly dealt with it. No doubt, he said, he would take off 1*d.* That would be a most popular remission of taxation. But he had not entered into the question of the collection of the tax under Schedule D, and that question had been raised throughout the length and breadth of the land. He (Colonel Barttelot) well recollected that he went with a deputation on that subject to the right hon. Gentleman, and that he was the only man who ventured to tell him that he was perfectly right in maintaining the tax, and also in maintaining Schedule D; but that the way in which the collections were made under that Schedule deserved some consideration by him. Schedule D pressed most severely upon the lower branch of the middle-class, and upon the larger class of tradespeople; and the tax was raised in a very arbitrary manner, and to an amount, in the case of small tradesmen especially, which was unfair and unjust. No doubt the assessors thought they might gain favour at headquarters by raising a large amount from the tax.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that the assessors were not the parties to whom the remark of the hon. and gallant Gentleman applied.

COLONEL BARTELOT: It was a mistake on his part to say it was the assessors. It was really the Government surveyors that were to blame in the matter. The assessors had a most difficult task to perform in doing what was right and fair. He had never as an Income Tax Commissioner, when he thought the assessment had been raised arbitrarily, entertained it; but, on the other hand, if he thought that the assessment ought to be raised, and it was clearly shown that a man was doing a better business than he himself returned, then it was for him to prove that he was not earning the money upon which he was taxed. The class, however, to which he had referred felt the tax exceedingly. Their complaint was that the tax was arbitrarily imposed upon them without any proper justification. They went further than that; they looked at the upper classes—at the large bankers and at the large brewers. They looked east of Temple Bar, and saw the enormous incomes which were being made there. ["Oh, oh!"] He might be wrong in his statement; but looking at the enormous incomes which were realized in this country, and the enormous profits which were made in large businesses, and then looking at what the returns for income tax were, the classes to which he had alluded thought that the richer classes did not pay anything like the same proportion as the smaller men who could not so well afford to appeal, and who did not, perhaps, care to prove that their business was not so flourishing as was believed. One of the great grievances of the income tax was that it was not meted out evenly between the higher class and the lower middle class, and that many of the former were exempted from paying on the enormous incomes which they were making. Large incomes were never made so easily as they had been made of late years; and although the income tax had largely increased, it had not grown in the proportion of the incomes that had been made during the last 20 years. He had no doubt that this remission of 1*d.* in the income tax would be most popular; but he wished that the right hon. Gentleman had made some little concession in regard to Schedule D, so that it might have been collected in a fairer and easier manner. He did not advocate the repeal of the income tax, because he thought it was necessary that its machinery should be preserved. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did right in reducing the tax, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to reduce it again; but if he would repair the defects of the machinery he would confer a great benefit on the people. With regard to the remission of sugar duty, he understood that the right hon. Gentleman would take care that it should be kept at such a rate as that it would not interfere with malt. The use of sugar in brewing would largely increase, and it should be fairly taxed as compared with malt.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON observed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, that they must all view the great increase in the revenue from the consumption of drink with mixed feelings. Now, any man of common humanity who had any regard for the well-being of the people of this country must look upon this enormous increase with feelings of unmixed regret. It had been said with great force that they had drunk themselves out of the Alabama difficulty. That might be a very clever proceeding, but was it right? There was only one man who wished his countrymen should drink more—the senior Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass)—and his wish was not that they should drink more spirits, but that they should drink more bitter beer. They ought not to discuss this question in a hard-and-fast way, as though they were a set of tax collectors, rejoicing at every method of raising revenue. They should take a more comprehensive view of the subject, and study the happiness of the whole people. Was there anything to rejoice at in the Prosperity Budget which had been introduced that night? A former Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, being told that a certain tax was bad for the morality of the country, said—"Thank God, I have nothing to do with the morality of the country!" He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) hoped the House would not endorse that opinion. The officers of the Inland Revenue did their duty ably and well; but if they were asked which they conceived to be the great end of Man, they would answer—"to consume the greatest possible amount of duty-paid spirits between the cradle and the grave." If the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. D. Dalrymple), dealing with habitual drunkards, passed, what would become of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? There were 33,000 habitual drunkards in England, and if they were all shut up what would be the consequence to the revenue? The habitual drunkard was the sheet anchor of the British Constitution. The Government and the Legislature of the country had allowed 150,000 tax gatherers to be commissioned to collect taxation through the means of selling drink. In short, Cowper's lines were still as applicable as ever—

"Ten thousand casks

For ever dribbling out their base contents,
Touch'd by the Midas finger of the State,
Bleed gold for Ministers to sport away.
Drink, and be mad then; tis your country bids!
Gloriously drunk obey th' important call!
Her cause demands th' assistance of your throats;
Ye all can swallow, and she asks no more."

The system of collecting a large proportion of their revenue by sending out these tax gatherers was a system which was mean, cruel, and short-sighted, and fraught with evil to the State. They had an enormous revenue to raise, and the Government of the country, finding that there was something which was very injurious to the people, and which they were very fond of drinking, proposed to check its consumption by putting upon it high duties, and they sent the tax gatherers to whom he had alluded to all parts of the country, especially the poorest, to collect the revenue for them. In his Budget speech of 1865 the Prime Minister said—

"Now, if you want to mark your high moral indignation at the use of spirits through the imperfect, yet not by any means wholly ineffective medium of fiscal arrangements, I think you cannot well go further than a rate of taxation under which, whenever a man is disposed to lay out 5s. in this commodity, he only gets at the outside 1s. worth of spirits for it, while the other 4s. go into the Exchequer."—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 1119.]

It was said that this was voluntary taxation. ["Hear!"] But if the hon. Member who cried "hear" set a trap and a rat walked into it, was that step quite a voluntary one on the part of the rat? The State enticed these people to drink, taking advantage of their vicious habits, and then thought it could satisfy its conscience by talking of the voluntary taxation incurred by the people of this country. They could not say that this increase had arisen from prosperous well-to-do people. The increase on foreign wines had been 3½ per cent, the increase on foreign spirits 1½; but when they came to British spirits, gin included, the increase was 11 per cent, and on beer 13 per cent, showing clearly that the very great increase had arisen from the poorest of the people. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had given them when considering the Education Bill the result of a tour through the slums of London; he graphically described the wretchedness and raggedness of the children, and asked where their parents were. He told the House they were in the gin and beer-shops which their legislation had put up. There was too much truth in this. The leading journal had accurately characterized public-houses as instrumental in degrading, brutalizing, and demoralizing a large portion of our people; our increased revenue, therefore, meant increased degradation and demoralization among our poorer fellow-countrymen, and no one anxious for the welfare of the people could regard this increased consumption of intoxicating liquor without pain. The high wages which had been received were a curse rather than a benefit to those who received them. He did not wish, however, to have the duties on spirits raised to a large extent. He hoped that the Committee would look into the matter and find some means of removing the vice which existed in the country.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, that he must remind his hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that so far as the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was concerned with respect to the evil complained of, the result was to repress the consumption of spirits. He had not heard anyone in the House advocate the reduction of the duty on spirits. If they advocated more drinking they would come and ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take the duty off spirits. But he would venture to submit to his hon. Friend that the proper time to discuss the question was when he moved the second reading of his Bill. Since the period during which the right hon. Gentleman had been in office, the country had been in a state of great prosperity, and he thought this was the time when they ought to take an opportunity of reducing our National Debt. He was glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to pay off one-half of the Alabama Claims out of the surplus. He wished he had proposed to pay off the whole. The next year and the year after the right hon. Gentleman might find himself compelled to ask for an increase in the income tax, as he thought it was not certain that the present prosperity would continue, and that therefore the revenue might diminish. Let them look to what had been done on the other side of the Atlantic. He was no admirer of American institutions, but in one respect they set us a great example, and that was in the great efforts which they had made to pay off their Debt created by the civil war only a few years ago. They were rapidly paying off that Debt, while we, having had nearly 60 years of peace, had gone on making infinitesimal efforts to reduce our National Debt.

Mr. J. B. SMITH said, he did not concur in the censure passed upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White), on account of his efforts to reduce the National Debt; on the contrary, in his (Mr. J. B. Smith's) opinion, there were circumstances in their present position which gave rise to grave reflections as to the course which it would become their duty to pursue in the disposal of any future surplus revenue. The Prime Minister, in a recent remarkable speech, observed that "we live in a wealth-making age," and he expressed the opinion that they had accumulated more wealth since the commencement of the present century than in all the preceding ages from the time of Julius Cesar. Assuming that to be a reasonable estimate of the marvellous increase in their wealth, and he (Mr. J. B. Smith) did not see any reason to question it, it became an interesting and important inquiry how it was that they had been able to accumulate that enormous wealth. There could not be a doubt that their extraordinary prosperity during the present century had arisen from the possession of vast supplies of coal and iron, which had given their manufacturing skill and industry advantages over all other countries. In fact they had up to the present time enjoyed a comparative monopoly of those important minerals. It would be folly, however, to shut their eyes to the progress of other countries, and to flatter themselves that they could for ever retain that monopoly. Already they saw the dawn of a rivalry which they must meet as best they could. Sir Charles Lyell stated that the coal fields of America extended 700 miles from east to west, and covered a larger surface than all England. Hitherto America had chiefly devoted herself to the development of her agricultural resources, but with the enormous increase of her population by immigration—which now exceeded their own, and was calculated by the close of the century to reach 100,000,000—she was turning attention to the development of her other resources, and the progress she had made in wealth, was even more extraordinary than that of the Old Country. That progress would be best exemplified by the consideration of a few facts. Not a mile of railway was made in America until after railways in England had become an established success, but on the 1st of January last, America had 70,000 miles of railway in operation, and 7,000 miles more in course of construction, which would be in operation this year; while England had only 16,000 miles of railway in operation. The American cities were formerly lighted with gas made from English coal, and when railways were first built there, they were worked with English coal or with wood; now they were all worked with American coal. The produce of coal in America last year was 42,000,000 tons, but great efforts were now being made to work mines in different parts of the country, but especially in Virginia, which was said to possess the richest coal mines in the world, and railways were in course of construction to bring coals to the outports. At the present moment coals were cheaper in America than in England, and it was hardly an exaggeration to say that they were “sending coals to Newcastle,” since they had the extraordinary spectacle of the depôts of the Royal Navy in the West Indies, South America, and Ceylon being now supplied with American coal, because it could be bought at a less price there than at Newcastle. There could be no doubt that the same causes which induced manufacturers in this country to settle in the neighbourhood of coal would equally operate in all other countries where coal existed, and those would become the greatest manufacturing countries, as population increased, where coal and iron most abounded. Now, seeing that that which had hitherto been the chief source of their wealth had nearly doubled in price within a year, was it not time to ask themselves—“Was their coal supply approaching exhaustion?” If so, ought they not, in considering how they should dispose of the present or any future surplus revenue to remember that they had still a National Debt amounting to £800,000,000? But, at all events, if their coal supply should yet last for some generations they were now for the first time exposed to competition—a competition, too, with an energetic and enterprising English race, and would it not be the height of folly, so long as their wealth was enormously increasing, not to reduce burdens, the relief from which would the better enable them to meet the inevitable competition which awaited them. With these views he (Mr. J. B. Smith) would have been better pleased if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, instead of taking one penny in the pound off the income tax, had increased it by two pence. There never was a period in their history when taxation bore so lightly upon the people in proportion to their means as at the present moment, and he therefore deprecated any reduction in taxation which would diminish the means of reducing their enormous National Debt. Let them remember and follow the good example of their fathers, who, in spite of the exhaustion arising from a long and expensive war and a debt of £900,000,000 in 1815, were so impressed with the moral obligation of those who contracted debts to make some efforts towards discharging them, that they resolved to set aside an annual sum for the reduction of the National Debt, which was reduced in the following 15 years by £60,000,000. Upwards of 40 years had since passed, and notwithstanding in that period the nation, according to the estimate of the Prime Minister, had accumulated an incalculable amount of wealth, it had nevertheless allowed the National Debt still to amount to the enormous sum of £800,000,000. Let them contrast that with the noble efforts of their race in America, who, since the 1st of February, 1866, had paid off upwards of £161,000,000 sterling of their National Debt, being at the rate of £23,000,000 per annum, whereby they had saved upwards of £9,000,000 a-year in the annual charge for interest on their debt. If, since the war of 1815, they had paid off their debt at half the rate the Americans had done, their National Debt by this time would have been nearly extinguished. He knew that that line of argument would not be popular with the unthinking clamourers for reduction of taxation out-of-doors, and it might be even with some of his own constituents, but the time had arrived when they could no longer safely delay the reduction of their National Debt, and the question was one which hon. Members ought not to avoid for the sake of a little temporary popularity; it was one on which he felt it his duty freely to speak his mind, and to pursue the course which he deemed best suited to the permanent interests of their country.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he had watched Budget after Budget, but had never heard one proposal from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of any remission especially in favour of the agricultural interest. The Committee had been told that the past year was one of unexampled prosperity, and so it might have been for trade and for drink, but not for the agricultural classes. The loss from foot and mouth disease throughout Great Britain amounted to not less than £12,000,000, and this had fallen entirely upon agriculture. There had been a season of unexampled wet weather last summer, which had caused a bad harvest, and it had been impossible to get in the seed last autumn for the harvest of the coming year. There had also been an enormous rise in the wages of labour, and although that might have been a fortunate thing for the Chancellor of the Exchequer in causing a rise of £5,000,000 in the Excise, chiefly in the article of drink, still it was anything but an advantage to the class he had the honour to represent. All these losses combined had made the past year a most disastrous one for the agricultural interest, and there was at present no hope of improvement. The right hon. Gentleman had admitted that the malt tax was a grievance, and yet, although his surpluses during the last four years had exceeded in the aggregate £16,000,000, and although the Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted that he had taken off £9,000,000 of taxes during the last four years, and was now going to take off upwards of £2,000,000 more, he had made no proposal to take off the malt tax. That matter ought to be seriously pressed on the attention of the country when the proper time arrived. In the year 1870 the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that that tax pressed heavily on the agricultural classes, and yet, notwithstanding he had during the last four years remitted taxes to the amount of £9,000,000, he had done nothing to relieve the agricultural classes. He trusted that these things would be borne in mind at the next General Election, and that the farmers and the agricultural classes generally would mark their sense of the neglect under which they were suffering. He could not understand why the Alabama Claims should all be paid in a single year, when the new Rules could only be for the advantage of posterity, if indeed they ever proved to be for the advantage of anybody. He considered it a great shame that such a course should have been taken.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought there must be an entire revision of the income tax by any Government who wished to administer the finances of the country with fairness and justice. It was most unjust to maintain Schedule D in its present relation to Schedule A, treating terminable income depending on health and strength as equal to an estate in land. When a man who had an income of £1,000 a-year from landed property died, his widow and children were left as well off as before; but when a professional man, earning £1,000 a-year from his own exertions, died, his income died with him. To say that those two men were in the same position, and that they ought to be taxed equally, was a perversion of everything that was morally just. If there could not be an entire revision of the principle on which Schedule D was framed, that was no reason why when there was a reduction in the tax some further reduction should not be made, perhaps of an extra penny in the pound in the case of those who paid under that Schedule. That would perhaps be a rough mode of meeting the difficulty, but he thought it would only be just.

MR. CORRANCE said, he had no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer had more money than he knew what to do with, but he had one means of getting rid of it that he had not contemplated when he last submitted his Budget to the House. No one would dispute the entire appropriateness of devoting a portion at least of his surplus in payment of the Alabama Claims. It was difficult to challenge the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman, for he stood on the very apex of prosperity. He had every right to be generous with the money which belonged to him—he had every right to take advantage of miscalculation; but before a man was generous it was usually convenient to be just. There had been a considerable increase in the malt duty, and what he asked was that there should be a restitution of that increase before the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to distribute his favours in the remission of other taxes. He had reduced the duty on sugar, and there was a close relation between the tax on sugar and the tax on malt. The right hon. Gentleman should not have disturbed that relation; at all events, his having done so established a very considerable claim in respect to malt. The right hon. Gentleman had shown in regard to coffee that the remission of part of the duty was attended with no loss to the revenue. Why had he never applied that principle to the malt duty? The right hon. Gentleman might gain a certain amount of popularity by taking a penny off the income tax; but, after all, that tax fell on those who were not more deserving of sympathy than the agricultural classes, for whose benefit no relief was proposed.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he would not detain the Committee by referring to the various questions introduced into this discussion by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith), but would come at once to the principal matters brought before them in the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He would therefore say at once that if one thing more than another struck him with regard to the Budget it was this—he could not help thinking and fearing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken too sanguine a view of the income of the coming year. It was impossible for any one to observe what was going on in the country without bringing his mind to the conclusion that we might not have during the coming year such a season of prosperity as during the past financial year. We could not expect to see our iron manufactures exported on so large a scale so long as coal continued at so high a price. He could not understand how any one could at present anticipate that we should have such a season of prosperity as we had recently passed through, and all he could wish was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might see his expectations realized. Assuming that they might be, he approved of the proposed method of disposing of the surplus. He was also of opinion that the course taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Alabama Claims was wise and prudent, and that he had acted judiciously in relieving the country of a portion of the burden in respect of the sugar duties. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that the reduction of the income tax was a sop to the rich, because it had always been held that the middle classes were the principal sufferers from the income tax. He must join in the warning given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer against the increasing dissatisfaction of the public with the income tax, and especially with the manner in which it was assessed under Schedule D. The income tax had served a great purpose, and he hoped it would be retained as a part of our system of taxation; but many representations had been made to him of the manner in which persons engaged in trade, and others not in trade, but possessed of small incomes, had been persecuted in relation to Schedule D. As an illustration, he might refer to one of the cases which had been described to him. In this instance a man who had been a captain of a ship in the employment of the owners of several vessels, being desirous in his old age of leaving the service, was provided on shore with an appointment to look after the vessels of his employers. For this he was paid £150, and on receiving the tax-paper he entered his income fairly and truly at that amount. He was assessed at £300; he appealed to his employers, who assisted him, and got him taxed at his real income of £150. The next year, however, when he made a return of £150, as before, he was charged at £400. This, he held, was simply a piece of tyranny, and the case was one of many which had been brought under his notice. Unless something was done to make the levying of the tax under Schedule D less obnoxious, the growing dissatisfaction would lead to something serious. He had many brewers among his constituents, and some of them had asked him to represent the unfairness of the brewer's licence. It was originally imposed as a substitute for the hop duty, but it produced much more, and the brewers felt that it was unjust that after a lapse of 20 years they were still made to bear the whole burden of the remission of that duty. It was 3*d.* a barrel, and represented about 3 per cent of the value, so that it was an income tax added to that which the brewers paid. He did not mean to represent the brewers as a long-suffering and ill-used race. No doubt they were prosperous, but it must be remembered that although the House had experience of those brewers to whom fortune had been kind, there was a large number engaged in the same occupation to whom this was a grievous burden. Another objection to the tax was that it was in the nature of a trade licence, which existed in hardly any other business. As to the National Debt, he was in favour of its gradual and continuous reduction. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had wisely named a distant day for the operation of the new sugar duties; but he feared inconvenience would result to refiners, who were now without stocks of raw material, and who could not, of course, buy in at present rates.

MR. GREENE feared it was impossible to create any sympathy for that ill-used class the brewers, upon whom the shilling tax was imposed in the hope that the reduced price of hops would enable them to recoup themselves; but hops had been dearer since the repeal of the duty. Why the brewer should pay a licence for the repeal of that duty any more than other manufacturers he could not conceive. The brewer held no monopoly, and any one could enter the business. He could not recoup himself by putting the price on the beer, because the least addition which could be made to the retail price was a farthing per pint, which, of course, would be an injustice to the consumer; and, with the increasing cost of commodities, this shilling duty was becoming more and more burdensome. There were taxes which pressed much more heavily on the people even than the taxes on sugar; and he thought that if the Government had possessed more discrimination and determination we should not have had to pay the Alabama Claims. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had left to his successors in office, from whichever side of the House they might come, a task which they would find it difficult to execute. Undoubtedly, we had enjoyed great prosperity, and there had been a large increase in the Excise; but his opinion was that the people had spent their money readily, on the "Easy come, easy go" system, and he did not believe the revenue of the coming financial year would at all approach the estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A more dangerous calculation he had never heard made on either side of the House. Instead of reducing the sugar duty, the right hon. Gentleman had much better have taken another penny off the income tax, which weighed heavily on people with small incomes, or a shilling a barrel off the brewer.

DR. LUSH remarked that on an occasion when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made great remissions of taxation it was rather an ungracious thing to criticize the mode in which that object had been attained; but his experience during the Recess convinced him that the question of the income tax would require in that House a better answer than had been given to it by the right hon. Gentleman, or by any of his predecessors in the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. To-night the right hon. Gentleman had assigned no reason whatever why the different Schedules of the income tax should be maintained in their integrity, but simply declared his intention of maintaining that integrity. Belonging, as he did, to a class of men who derived their whole incomes from the efforts of their hands or brains, he felt bound to enter a protest against the continuation of that system under which the earnings of a professional man were assessed at the same rate as realized property. It was impossible for any one who had had experience of the matter to feel otherwise than that the tax was unjust and improper. Assuming that an income of £500 a-year was derived from the Funds, it might be assumed to be worth 30 years' purchase; but, in the case of a man who earned a professional income, it was impossible that he could be sure of more than two or three years' purchase. This circumstance was in itself sufficient to show that there existed an essential difference in the value of the two incomes, and that to assess them both at the same rate was unjust. Moreover, this argument was strengthened by the consideration that a professional income was dependent on the good health of the person earning it. Years ago the income tax was as high as 1s. 2d. in the pound, and at such a period it would doubtless have been very difficult to remit the tax; but now, when the tax was so low that it really was a matter of sentiment rather than of pressure, an investigation might be suitably made. He believed that a grave dislike existed to this tax apart from the mere dislike of taxation, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider the arguments which had been brought to bear against the present system.

MR. CLARE READ said, they had heard of various reductions of the sugar duty. In 1870 the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after announcing his intention to reduce the duties on sugar, stated that as far as he was concerned there was an end of the reduction, and that the proposal then made might be regarded as something like finality. Yet after a lapse of only three years the right hon. Gentleman actually proposed to reduce the existing duty by one-half. For his own part, he wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer would try his hand at malt. These constant reductions of sugar might be very good, but surely the time had arrived when something might be done on behalf of malt. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown that while the duty on spirits had increased £1,300,000, the duty on malt had only increased £400,000. Now, when it was considered that the latter increase was made up principally by a very large proportion of sugar being used in brewing, rather than barley, and that, in consequence of the bad harvest in this country, the duty had been chiefly paid on foreign barley, he thought he was justified in saying that the British farmer had not received fair treatment at the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He represented an essentially barley-growing county (Norfolk) where the duty on malt came to something like 25s. on every acre of arable land. It was very astonishing that the right hon. Gentleman had made no provision for any reduction or remission of local taxation, considering that last year a majority of 100 in that House declared it to be the duty of Government to make some provision for the expenses paid by local authorities. It appeared to him extraordinary that with an abundant Exchequer and the most fruitful revenue ever known, and after so deliberate and determined a vote of the House of Commons, no remission of local taxation had been made.

MR. GRIEVE congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on his Budget, as a whole. He thought, however, that the whole question of the income tax ought to have been considered before a reduction was made, and that if any remission were granted it ought to be under the head of Schedule D. With regard to the reduction of the sugar duty, he quite approved it, but thought it would scarcely reach the large consuming classes, because it would be impossible for the retailers to split up a farthing. The reduction would certainly surprise the trade, and the fact that it was not to take effect until the 8th of May must throw the whole trade into confusion. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would, in this instance, follow the course taken on a former occasion, allow the law to take effect immediately, and give a drawback on the stocks as before.

MR. W. FOWLER said, as he understood the Report received from the Committee of Public Accounts, it was by no means clear what was the actual amount taken from Post Office revenue for the payment for telegraphic services, and what had been taken from the money due to the Savings Banks Commissioners. If that was still a matter of uncertainty, it was far from clear what was the actual revenue of the Post Office for the present year, and, if so, the total revenue of the nation for the year was also uncertain. As they were told this evening by the Postmaster General that the question to which he had referred could not be at present cleared up, he should like to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the best explanation of the actual state of the case. They had heard a good deal to-night about the existence in this Budget of over-estimates of revenue with regard to the future. Well, he came down to the House prepared to find fault with the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the contrary error, and for having drawn from the people of this country a far larger amount than he really required. He, for one, would rather see the Chancellor of the Exchequer occasionally compelled to borrow a small sum than habitually taking out of the pockets of the people a very large sum which he did not want. During the four years that the right hon. Gentleman had been Chancellor of the Exchequer he had had an average surplus of from £2,000,000 to £3,000,000 a-year, and he was not prepared to blame him for a change of proceeding in this respect. And now as to the mode of collection adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which might be said to be a peculiar and private invention of his own. It had been the custom of this country for a long time past to endeavour to make the collection of the taxes by the Government as even as possible by spreading it over different periods of the year, and various processes had been invented by different Chancellors of the Exchequer to avoid the great inconvenience of having vast sums heaped up doing nothing at particular seasons, and the Government short of money at other times of the year. A few figures which would throw light on the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be interesting. In the year 1869 he told the right hon. Gentleman that his mode of collecting the income tax and the assessed taxes in a lump not only bore heavily on the taxpayers, but was exceedingly inconvenient as a matter of finance. From the first Return of the Bank of England in the month of April for the different years it would be found that in the year 1868 the Public Deposits for this period of the year were £6,900,000, the other Deposits of the Bank which represented its ordinary business were £20,200,000, and the other securities which represented the investments of the Bank, other than Government securities, were £20,600,000. In 1869 the Public Deposits were £7,800,000, the other deposits £17,400,000, the other securities £20,000,000. Then came the new mode of collection, and under it the Public Deposits rose in 1870 to £11,200,000, the other deposits were £17,100,000, and the other securities more than £21,100,000. In 1871 the Public Deposits were £10,500,000, the other deposits £20,000,000, and the other securities £22,800,000. In 1872 the Public Deposits were £12,700,000, the other deposits £19,200,000, and the other securities £25,900,000. This year the Public Deposits were £15,800,000, the other deposits £19,700,000, and the other securities reached the enormous sum of £28,800,000. Now, making every allowance for the great development of business in the country, the Committee would observe that while the other deposits, representing the ordinary deposits in the Bank, remained almost stationary, the Public Deposits had become enormous, and had taken with them the other securities. As far as he was concerned, this state of things was a source of emolument to him; but, nevertheless, he held that it was a most inconvenient system of finance that there should be these enormous sums taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the country and heaped up in the Bank of England, doing nothing except adding to the profits of the Bank. The Bank of England, as the House was informed last year by the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) was absolutely indifferent about the matter; but a mode of collection which left so large a sum of money absolutely unused, so far as the Government and the public were concerned, involved a very unsound system of finance, and with a machine so delicate as the Money Market such a plan would one day or another produce very inconvenient results. Another point which had a great claim on their attention was the manner in which the railway interest was taxed. He thought that that interest had not received the justice from the House to which it was entitled, because not only were the shareholders heavily taxed as owners of real estate during their lives, but when they died their property was treated as personal property, and made to pay taxes from which heritable property was exempt. In the taxation of railways, the vast amount representing rails and sleepers was treated as part of the freehold for purposes of assessment, and the companies were not allowed to deduct anything in respect of them, although they were unquestionably as little part of the land as rolling stock. That would never be altered, except by a Vote of this House, and it was time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should see that something should be done to lighten their burdens, as a large share of the stock was held by poor people. The income tax ought not to be dealt with as a question affecting rich people only; it affected the very poor as well, and therefore the most anxious consideration ought to be given with the view that the rich should not be let off lightly and the poor unduly taxed. An hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Barttelot) had charged people east of Temple Bar with giving in deceptive returns, as if those who lived on that side were rogues and scoundrels. But he defied the hon. and gallant Gentleman to prove it. He was aware that the Returns to be found in the Library gave most extraordinary instances of fraud; but that was not confined to the east of Temple Bar, and he ventured to say that some professional gentlemen to the west were not immaculate. He wished to say a few words as regarded the reduction of the National Debt, and the payment of the Alabama Claims. He thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had adopted a wise course. He (Mr. Fowler) was not one of those who felt intense anxiety as to the reduction of the Debt. It might be perfectly true that when people were prosperous they should reduce their obligations; but in national matters they must not forget whom it was that they had to charge. They had to tax poor people as well as rich, and this being so it became a question whether the rapid reduction of the Debt was a sound and true policy. He did not say that at present they were going too fast in this direction; but if asked to go much faster he should hesitate. He believed that the savings of the country were so enormous that those who lived 20 years hence would be far more able to pay the Debt than those of the present time were. He agreed with the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that the maintenance of enormous military establishments was incompatible with a large diminution of taxation, and if those were necessary we must go on spending £70,000,000 a-year. He did not agree with the hon. Member as to the Permissive Bill, for he believed legislation could not prevent indulgence in intoxicating drinks, but the Imperial revenue accruing therefrom could not be matter for congratulation, and he would remind hon. Members opposite that the existence of a great revenue from this source must involve an increase in local taxation because rates were largely affected by the vast expense caused by pauperism and crime. He was glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer had altered his mind respecting the sugar duty since 1870, and, on the whole, he could congratulate him on his Budget.

Mr. W. Fowler

Mr. G. BENTINCK agreed that it was impossible to make men sober by Act of Parliament; and he was glad to hear so sound a statement made upon the other side of the House. The hon. Members (Mr. Clare Read and Mr. Corranee) had naturally enough lamented the total indifference that the Chancellor of the Exchequer exhibited in the case of the malt tax. The whole tendency of legislation for the last 40 years had been in favour of the urban as against the rural districts in reference to taxation; and the finishing blow was the Reform Bill of 1867, which placed political power in the hands of the town population. He (Mr. Bentinck) did not look forward with any sanguine hope to the repeal of the duty on malt, and certainly not if the present Chancellor of the Exchequer continued to hold his office. He regretted the off-hand tone in which the right hon. Gentleman had referred to the Alabama Indemnity, for he could recollect a time when an example of human folly and national degradation unparalleled in history would not have been treated as a mere matter of financial arrangement; but he would not then discuss that subject, as there would be another opportunity of doing so—and, he trusted, in a fuller House—when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take a Vote for the payment of the damages. His main object in rising was to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and it was one of vast importance, if his figures were correct? It had recently been stated by a high financial authority in the House that the almost fabulous sum of £6,000,000,000 changed hands in the Clearing House during the last year. He (Mr. Bentinck) did not assert that this sum represented the amount of capital employed in commercial transactions. He said it did not represent the amount of capital embarked in commercial occupations in this country; but it represented an amount of capital such as was not to be found in any other country in the world. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would inform the Committee what was the amount of capital embarked in commercial enterprise which was represented by the sums of money that passed each year through the Clearing House. Whatever the amount of such capital might be, two things were certain with respect to it—namely, that it was only subject to Id.

stamp duty on transfer, and that it did not contribute in any other shape or way to the rates or taxes of the country. If that were so then he contended the Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to tax that property in proportion to the burdens which were laid on other descriptions of property. The malt duty at this moment paid 100 per cent and tobacco 500 per cent, and these, he might say, were necessities of life to the working man. Why, then, was the enormous amount of capital to which he had referred, and which was employed in commercial operations, allowed to escape taxation altogether to the prejudice of the labouring population, who contributed so heavily and in so many ways to the Customs revenue of the country.

MR. MACFIE agreed with those who had expressed the opinion that in a time of prosperity like the present it was our duty to reduce the National Debt. That policy was advocated warmly by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and he only regretted that it had not been carried out on the present occasion. Another objection to the Budget had come from what he might call the temperance interest; but he would remind the hon. Baronet who spoke on that subject (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that the Budget did a great deal in support of the principles which he advocated by cheapening those necessities of life which came into competition with strong drinks. Another objection had been urged on behalf of the agricultural classes; but their interests had not been overlooked, as they would be considerable gainers by the reduction of the duty on molasses, which was largely used in the preparation of food for cattle, and also in the reduction of the sugar duties, which would stimulate the cultivation of beet, for which end he should have preferred to see the whole of the duty taken off sugar, rather than that 1*d.* should be taken off the income tax. Rather than miss entire removal of the sugar duty, he considered it would be good policy to add 2*d.* to the duty on tea, if that were the only condition on which so great a boon could be obtained; for to consumers at the breakfast and tea-tables it would be much the same thing. He also contended that some steps should be taken to prevent foreign refiners from obtaining in the interval of four weeks and a half before the duty on sugar came off advantages of which our own refiners would be deprived, otherwise we should find the market overstocked with large quantities of refined sugar, greatly to the loss of home manufacturers. He suggested that there should be a difference in the time at which the duty should be taken off refined sugar as compared with unrefined, unless the proposition of the hon. Member for Greenock were assented to.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, great complaints had been made of the inequality of the income tax; but he was inclined to believe there were still many who paid less than the law required of them. He did not however dispute that a great improvement in its collection might be made. With regard to what had been said of bankers east of Temple Bar, he would remind the House that they not only paid under Schedule D, but also on the amount of the investments they held. He agreed, also, with the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) in his objection to the collection of so large a portion of the revenue in the early part of the year. When the system was introduced he addressed a letter on the subject to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the name of the Committee of Bankers, pointing out the inconvenience which would result from it. The committee suggested that some of the taxes should be collected in the latter half of the year, otherwise they feared that some derangement of the Money Market would result. Easy times had been the rule since, and as long as they continued nothing very serious would occur; but in a difficult year this system of pressing so much of the year's taxation into the first three months might cause serious embarrassment. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Cambridge that it was undesirable to reduce Debt because the people were not all rich. It seemed to him that the poorer the country the more desirable it was to regulate the taxes with economy and discretion. He had been much pleased to hear so many advocate a greater reduction of Debt than had been proposed. The Government also had in theory expressed the same feeling. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had thrown most heart into that part of his speech which dealt with reduction of Debt, but his actual proposals were very meagre. He had said, indeed, that the Debt would be decreased by £6,000,000 during the year; but a considerable proportion of that reduction would be produced by the surplus revenue of the year just closed, and the total actual reduction of this year contemplated by the arrangements the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed would be under £1,000,000. The remission of taxation he proposed and the half of the Geneva Award would swallow up almost the whole surplus estimated revenue; and the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) had expressed the opinion that the revenue of the year was over-estimated. Still, the figures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be taken with some confidence, considering his uniform caution in the past. Our position with regard to debt in the year just opening was, upon the basis of the figures supplied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, simply this:—£2,500,000 would be paid off by the Terminable Annuity scheme; but then it was proposed to borrow £1,600,000 to pay one-half of the Alabama Indemnity. Deducting one from the other, the net reduction of debt during this current year would be only £900,000. Such a result was unworthy of the House and the country. If it was wise to reduce the National Debt, it ought to be done annually, and on a larger scale. One great element of the nation's strength was its financial position, and he regretted most deeply that it was to go forth to the world that in a period of unexampled prosperity we could not bring ourselves to pay a sum of £3,250,000 without borrowing. How could we expect foreign countries to realise our financial strength if we would not face so small a payment without borrowing £1,600,000? No doubt the Budget would be popular in the country; he had no objection to offer to the proposed reductions, except that he believed the country expected the Alabama Claims would have been satisfied out of the revenue of the year, and it would have been better if that expectation had been realized. It would be better for trade under any circumstances if fewer changes were made in taxation. The hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Grieve) had stated that the change in the sugar duties would derange the trade in sugar for some time to come. All such changes deranged trade, and it would be a very good thing if the Budgets of the next four or five years were stereotyped, that surpluses might accumulate for the reduction of the National Debt and the permanent burdens of the country.

MR. WHALLEY regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had disregarded the remonstrances which had been urged in many quarters against Schedule D, and had not explained the grounds upon which he proposed to continue to tax precarious incomes and incomes from property upon the same footing.

MR. FAWCETT said, the question repeatedly asked during the past week had been whether they were to have a self-sacrificing Budget or a popular one? That question had been answered by the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that evening. They had undoubtedly had produced to them what they looked upon as a popular Budget. For his part, he did not grudge the Government any advantage which might be derived from the popularity thus obtained; but he was bound to confess that many in that House and out of it who placed faith in the financial wisdom of the Prime Minister, and who viewed his enunciation of financial principles as the greatest achievements of a distinguished life, felt no little disappointment. Until they heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that night they had confidence that there was one thing, at least, on which the Prime Minister would stand firm, and that was that in a year which they heard constantly described as one of exceptional prosperity, if a claim for £3,250,000 was made upon them, they would not resort to what he would call the almost cowardly financial expedient of paying a portion of that money by borrowing. It was all very well for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say he hoped he would not have to issue Exchequer bonds for that purpose. That was the language they were certain to hear. If a man had a bill presented to him he said, "Oh, I won't pay it all now; I will only pay half of it. I will wait six months and see—like Micawber—what will turn up." Of course, he hoped he would not have to pay it, and that some fortuitous piece of good luck would fall to him. Now, some reasons might be adduced to show that, considering the estimates which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made of the revenue, the odds decidedly were that those Exchequer bonds would have to be issued. What was the nature of the Alabama Claim? An analogy could not be drawn between it and a charge incurred for some prospective advantage to be conferred on the country. If they were about to carry out some great public work for the benefit of future generations as much as of the present, they might, if necessary, fairly distribute the payment over a series of years. But the Alabama Claim was a sum they had to pay for a great wrong done some years ago to another nation. Who were responsible for that wrong? People who were then living, and, he was sorry to say, many men who now occupied a prominent position in political life. It having been decided that this money was due from us as a nation, all he could say was that those who lived in 1873-4 were more responsible for its payment than those who might live in 1874-5, or in any succeeding year. Therefore, the honourable and straightforward thing for them to do was to pay the sum at once out of the revenue of the coming year. What a position they would occupy in the eyes of the world! They had been boasting about their extraordinary prosperity; they had exhausted all the language of panegyric to describe their glowing trade, their marvellous exports and imports; and did it all come to this—that they could not pay £3,250,000 without recourse to borrowing, as if they were a half-bankrupt and seriously-embarrassed country? He did not wish unnecessarily to bring a single accusation against the Budget. If they were to have remission of taxation, he was bound to say the Chancellor of the Exchequer had adopted a wise principle in saying that one half of that remission should go to direct, and the other half to indirect taxation. But if the income tax was to be reduced, relief might have been given to the payers of that tax in a somewhat more satisfactory way; and he doubted whether the reduction of the sugar duties was the most advisable mode of remitting indirect taxation. First, as to the income tax, no one could doubt that a very serious agitation was arising against that tax, and no small part of the discontent expressed in regard to it resulted from the unnecessary amount of worry and annoyance caused to the people in collecting it. But the income tax appeared to him to be based on a sound financial principle; and he would venture to offer those who were agitating against it out of doors this piece of advice—that their agitation would prove much more effectual if they confined themselves to attacking the salient points of injustice about the tax, without demanding anything so violent as its total and unconditional repeal, or anything so monstrous as the entire exclusion of Schedule D. Was there ever anything short of expunging the National Debt, or going in for wholesale confiscation, so unjust as a proposition that the poor man, who had saved, perhaps, after a hard struggle, a couple of thousand pounds, with which, in his old age, he purchased an annuity of £200 to protect himself against dependence, should be liable to an income tax, and that the wealthy banker, stocker, or merchant who came under Schedule D, with an income of £20,000, should altogether escape scot-free? Unless all idea of financial justice had died out in this country, such a demand as that could never be conceded. At the same time, he felt that a very conclusive case had been made out for giving some relief to the possessors of temporary incomes. There was undoubtedly a great difference between the possessor of a permanent and the possessor of a temporary income. The former with £600 a-year was really, for all practical purposes, a far wealthier man than the latter with nominally the same annual income. Now, he was not so presumptuous as to suppose that he had found the solution of one of the most difficult financial problems; but he would suggest a way in which relief might be given that would reconcile the people far more to the income tax than would ever be the case as long as Governments persisted in saying there should be no difference whatever in the amount levied from temporary and from permanent incomes. He would propose that a certain proportionate amount, say one-third, should be deducted from all temporary incomes, and that while the possessor of a permanent income of £600 a-year, for example, should be taxed on the whole £600, the possessor of a temporary income of £600 should be taxed as if he had only £400. Then another kind of relief might be granted. At the present time, considering the high wages earned by many classes of artisans, there was no class so heavily burdened with taxes as persons with incomes between £100 and £150 who were liable to income tax. Considering the great increase in the cost of meat, the minimum income on which the tax was levied might fairly be raised. They might start with £150; and then they should not do what was now done by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, deduct £80 from incomes of £100, which created the injustice that an income of £99 was not taxed at all, whereas the man who had £1 more was taxed on £20; but they should deduct that £150 from all incomes on which the tax was levied. He did not say that his two suggestions were the best which could be offered; but if something were done in the direction he had indicated the people would feel that an injustice had been recognized, and much existing dissatisfaction would cease. With regard to the proposed reduction of the sugar duty, it was scarcely worth while to have touched it until they were in a position to have remitted it altogether. This remission of the duty would cheapen sugar about one farthing a pound. It was well known that of so small a reduction of duty a considerable proportion went into the pocket, not of the consumer, but of the dealer. There was, moreover, the disadvantage that all the expensive machinery for the collection of the tax had to be kept up. An hon. Member had, in conversation with him, suggested that if they were going to reduce indirect taxation, it would have been much better instead of tampering with the sugar duty to have remitted some duty such as that on coffee altogether. There was another point to which he wished to direct the attention of the Committee. It seemed to him that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had greatly over-estimated the revenue of the coming year. He would not be presumptuous enough to express this opinion as an individual opinion of his own; but he ventured unhesitatingly to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not find a single London banker, a single merchant, a single Lancashire or Yorkshire manufacturer who would say that it would be prudent even to bet that the prosperity of the coming year was likely to equal the prosperity of the last year. Every sign by which they could judge seemed to indicate that the last year was one of exceptional prosperity. The Excise duties were beginning to ebb; the advanced price of coal must greatly affect industry; and the disputes between labour and capital, daily assuming increased significance, were beginning to tell on the prosperity of the country. Seeing how that prosperity had been used, the tide, if it once turned, would ebb with remarkable rapidity. The figures which had been adduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought out this fact—that unhappily the great prosperity which had been enjoyed had only been to a small extent utilized by the working classes. It had been marked, not by a greatly increased or proportionate accumulation of wealth, but by a prodigious consumption of spirits and intoxicating liquors. What did that mean? It meant that the working classes had little reserve to meet adverse times, and that when these adverse times came, they could not live a month without support from others. They had seen that men who had been striking to obtain higher wages were obliged to claim assistance from others, and to maintain themselves by parochial relief. They might, therefore, depend that if the tide once began to turn, it would ebb with great rapidity. There would be no reserve fund on which the working classes could support themselves; hundreds would be thrown out of work; a powerful force antagonistic to the prosperity of the country would be brought into operation; and, viewing all these things, he thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been over confident in calculating the revenue of the coming year as equal to that of the past. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have neglected another most serious consideration. Last year a Motion was carried by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), in favour of transferring certain local charges to the Consolidated Fund. He (Mr. Fawcett) hoped that they might derive this consolation from the Financial Statement that the Government were going to stand positively firm against this demand. But if they did not do so—if in the Bill on Local Taxation there was any proposal to transfer local charges to the Consolidated Fund, then the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be thrown into confusion, for there might be a serious change in the coming year, for which the Government had made no provision. Frequent reference had been made to the efforts which they should make to pay off Debt. What they were doing in the present year was simply a repetition of the blunder of Mr. Pitt's Sinking Fund. They were paying off Debt in the form of Terminable Annuities with the one hand, and borrowing with the other. When those Terminable Annuities were created he expressed a fear that a day would come when Ministers would not have the courage to carry out the scheme consistently; but he did not expect that the Ministers who would show the want of courage would be the Ministers who brought these Terminable Annuities into existence. A financial fact could not be got rid of by a hocus-pocus, and whether called a temporary loan or Exchequer bonds it was borrowing all the same. If everything favourable happened, the money might be paid off next year; but in case of a bad harvest, financial disasters and panics, extended trade disputes, there would be no surplus with which to do this, and the bonds would have to be renewed. While paying off £2,600,000 by Terminable Annuities, they were about to adopt a course which would probably necessitate the borrowing of £1,700,000. The vice of Mr. Pitt's Sinking Fund was this—that he indulged himself in the meaningless but costly amusement of creating Debt with the one hand and paying it off with the other. He (Mr. Fawcett) had hoped that this financial policy was exploded. He did not expect from any protest against the Budget much if any effect. It was no doubt a popular Budget, and a General Election, perhaps, being imminent, it would probably produce its effect. He felt bound, however, to protest against a policy unworthy of a great country; for if Parliament had confidence in the prosperity of which it was boasting, it should have had the courage of its convictions, and should not have hesitated to pay at once out of the resources of the time the debt of the not very large amount of £3,250,000.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, that complaints had been made that this Budget was against the agricultural interest. Now, with regard to the malt tax, he denied that it was paid by the agriculturists. It was paid by the consumers, who were the inhabitants of large towns. The landed interest would get the advantage of the 1*d.* which was to be taken off the income tax. He thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no alternative but to take off this 1*d.* If he continued the present mode of collection, the odium thereby created would jeopardize the existence of the tax. The number of persons surcharged was extraordinary, and it did not answer the purpose of a man surcharged to the extent of £100, £200, £300, or £400 only, to appeal, and he rather submitted to the annoyance of paying the improper amount. The Chancellor of the Exchequer should have raised the exemption from £100 to £150. At the proper time, he (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) would take the liberty of bringing the subject under the notice of the House. He did not share in the anticipations of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White). Although the Chancellor of the Exchequer took the power to borrow next year £1,600,000 to pay America, he thought that he might fairly assume, as he had done, that he would be able to pay the money from the ordinary income of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, on his last Budget, promised to exempt from the inhabited house duty tenements used only for business purposes, and occupied only by a servant for the purpose of taking care of the premises, provided they did not exceed £20 a-year in value; but he had not redeemed his promise. He should, on a future occasion, call attention to the incidence of the probate duty, from which at present freehold property was exempt.

MR. LAING said, he thought that, on the whole, the Budget was a good one. The main point at issue undoubtedly was, whether the whole of the Alabama Indemnity should be paid out of next year's surplus, or whether the whole of the surplus should be appropriated to the remission of taxation. Although he rather favoured the latter view, he still thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in charging half of the amount of the Indemnity against the surplus, had come to a wise and satisfactory compromise between the extreme views. Some hon. Members appeared to think that a great effort ought to be made towards the reduction of the National Debt; but such a course would be contrary to the principles which had been enunciated by our greatest financial statesmen, who had always acted on the plan of appropriating surplus towards relieving the people from taxation. In this way the resources of the country had been increased to an extraordinary extent. Everyone had the same object in view, and that was to produce the greatest prosperity of the country, and to raise its credit as high as possible. He challenged anyone to show that during the last 40 years it would have been wiser for us to burden our industry and keep up an excessive amount of taxation, simply for the purpose of reducing our National Debt, than to pursue the policy which was inaugurated by Sir Robert Peel and followed by his successors. Take the case of two gentlemen who had each an estate worth £100,000 encumbered with a mortgage of £50,000. Suppose that one of them pursued the policy of laying out nothing for the improvement of his estate, of living economically and paying his debts, and that in the course of 20 years he paid half of his debt; he would have an estate worth £100,000 encumbered with a debt of £25,000, leaving a margin of £75,000. Suppose the other proprietor by a judicious expenditure doubled the value of his estate, but left the debt stationary; his estate would be worth £200,000 minus an encumbrance of £50,000; the margin in that case would be £150,000. The result in the latter case represented the beneficial effects of the policy which this country had pursued for the last 40 years. He believed that it was far better for posterity, whose interests found such zealous advocates in some persons, that we should pursue that policy instead of an opposite course. He admitted that the question of paying off National Debts must depend upon the circumstances of the case. In the case of the United States, there were special considerations which made it a very prudent policy to impose taxes in order to reduce the National Debt. The interest upon the Debt was 6 per cent; it was therefore wise to impose taxes to reduce it. Again, at the termination of the war there was a question, whether a repudiation or an honest policy should be pursued. A policy of repudiation became discredited. Therefore, the United States had a palpable motive for the policy they pursued. He should have been the very warmest advocate for that policy if he had been a member of the American Legislature; but he protested against the adoption of such a policy in this country. The plan for paying off our National Debt was simply the taking of money out of our pockets to invest it at 3½ per cent. Could anyone doubt that if the reduction on the sugar and tea duties had not been made, and if the money they remitted had been applied to the reduction of the National Debt, the revenue would have been in its present flourishing condition? And was there any reason to doubt that the reduction of the sugar duties would, in the course of two or three years, be followed by increased consumption? Again, sugar could not be exported into this country without increasing its commerce. He did not deprecate a wise and moderate reduction of the National Debt. He did not say that, under ordinary circumstances, £1,000,000 a-year might not properly be devoted to that object. If any sudden emergency should arise, we, by having pursued the policy of the last few years, could borrow £200,000,000 at 3½ per cent, when other countries would be unable to borrow half that amount at less than 5 per cent. He admitted that when a large reduction of taxation was proposed to be made in consequence of the large surplus of this year, it was not for particular interests such as that which he advocated the other night to stand in the way. If one-half the duty was taken off sugar a corresponding reduction ought to be made in another direction, and that was done by the proposed reduction of the income tax. With regard to the taxes on locomotion and the grievances of railway passengers, they must wait for a more convenient season. He hoped that another year would find the right hon. Gentleman in possession of a considerable surplus, and that it would be applied in a wise and fruitful remission of taxation. There was one point on which he wished a little more specific information. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with the Alabama Indemnity in this way—one-half to be borne by the revenue of the current year, and the other half to be paid out of the balances, and he proposed to raise Exchequer Bills or Bonds in case of need. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER assented.] He thought, on the whole, that the Budget was one which would give considerable satisfaction.

MR. GREGORY agreed in the opinion which had been already expressed that the agricultural interest had been somewhat neglected by the right hon. Gentleman. He appeared to have given the go-by to a Resolution which was come to by a large majority last Session, which distinctly pledged the Government to a certain transfer of the local taxation of the country by which the agricultural interest would be benefited. It could only be supposed that he ignored that proposition on the present occasion. The right hon. Gentleman proposed a further reduction in the sugar duties which was little calculated to benefit the consumer. Instead of the proposed remission of duties, he thought it would have been far better to have appropriated the money to the payment of the remainder of the Alabama Claims. When an honest man owed a debt he provided for the payment of it as soon as he could. The mode adopted by the right hon. Gentleman in this respect was very much like paying off one obligation by contracting another. When Exchequer Bills were issued they were an obligation upon the Government, and had to be liquidated at some future time. With regard to the income tax, if the remission of the tax altogether had been extended to incomes of under £150, many hard-working, frugal, and deserving people would have been benefited, and they were a class who were worthy of the consideration of the House.

MR. MUNTZ said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be in the peculiar position of pleasing no one entirely and very few partially. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the middle course he had taken for the payment of the Alabama Claims. It was a course which secured our finances for next year, and left no reasonable prospect that the right hon. Gentleman's calculations for the future would be disturbed. We could not expect that the prosperity we had lately enjoyed would continue for long. There was sure to be a reaction, when high prices and high wages would have had their day; but due allowance had been made for any temporary reverse. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for taking a penny off the income tax. It was only those who knew the masses of the poorer classes who could tell how heavily this tax pressed upon them. The rich did not feel it; but the poor shopkeeper in a country town, and the struggling clerk who made only £150 or £200 a-year, and who had to suffer from bad debts, felt its pressure most grievously. The right hon. Gentleman extended the exemption last year from £60 to £80, and he (Mr. Muntz) regretted that he had not now extended it to £100. Such a course would be a great boon to the poor, and the revenue would not lose very much by it. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would try to adopt some better means of collecting a tax which, through its inquisitorial character, had really become a positive nuisance. A plan which had some advocates was one for capitalizing incomes, and making this the basis of assessment. Another plan, which had been successfully carried out in two of the American States, was that of collecting the tax on declared property, each taxpayer declaring the value of his own property. The assessment might be made on property in that way, and to guard against unfair valuations, a pre-emption right might be given to the Government to take the whole of a man's property if they chose, paying him off according to the value he had put upon it, with 10 per cent advance, as was the case formerly with the Customs duties. A man who was worth £200,000 would hardly return himself at half that sum under such circumstances. At any rate, the income tax could no longer remain as it stood, for there was an intense feeling on the subject in the large towns. On the whole, the Budget was one which the country would accept favourably.

MR. BARNETT asked the right hon. Gentleman what course would be taken respecting the dividends which had that day been paid upon a proportion of the public funds. From those dividends income tax had been deducted at the rate of 4*d.* in the pound, though the tax itself expired yesterday. There was an impression in the City that those dividends should receive the benefit of the change; and, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman would state how he proposed to deal with this and with another question, which would arise from day to day respecting the tax accruing upon dividends and coupons.

Schedule D

MR. AUBERON HERBERT deprecated the dangerous though plausible doctrine enunciated by the hon. Member (Mr. Laing). When a gentleman said he was prepared to adopt an heroic course in another country under other circumstances, but was not prepared to adopt it in his own country under present circumstances, such advice was always to be distrusted. In America, according to the hon. Gentleman, there was a certain danger of repudiation, and therefore he was prepared in America to repay debt. But if in this country our present prosperity did not continue, and we had a succession of adverse years, was there not also some danger of repudiation here? ["No, no!"] Hon. Members were more sanguine than he was, for even in these prosperous times he had heard suggestions of repudiation. The right hon. Gentleman, who did not succeed on a former occasion in finding "light," had now found sweetness in sugar. There seemed to be a little too much sugar on the Treasury Bench, and measures were framed rather to please and conciliate than to do what was right. We ought at once to have discharged the Alabama Claim. The right hon. Gentleman was too straightforward to claim credit for the reduction of the National Debt by £6,000,000, because he knew that he had nothing to do with it, and that it was done under an Act of Parliament. He was glad a reduction had been made in the duty on sugar, and thought we were throwing away many great advantages by not carrying out the free-trade policy to its furthest development, and making this country the free port of the world. But such a policy could not be carried out by avoiding obligations or indulging too sanguine anticipations of revenue. The only course was to adopt the shorter and nobler method from which the Government had shrunk, of making large reductions in our expenditure. It was said that the Government stood with one foot in the grave, and he would call upon them before the other foot followed to repent in this matter of expenditure, and try to show the country that they were willing to redeem the pledges they had given.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was of opinion that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was incomplete in so far as it made no allusion to those matters which, as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, he had been obliged to take cognizance of during the last two months. The Committee was aware that a large amount of revenue due to the country had been taken for the construction of telegraph extensions; that the subject was the more interesting as a matter of revenue since they had been informed that the moneys due to the National Debt Commissioners had been paid over. It would seem that a sum approaching £700,000 or £800,000 must be due to the revenue by the Post Office in some form, and he should be glad to know whether in his estimate the right hon. Gentleman had taken that sum into account. It must be obvious, in the next place, that a sum approaching, if not actually amounting to, £1,000,000 would have to be borrowed in order to replace the money which had been so abstracted, and the right hon. Gentleman would perhaps give some information on the point.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I regret that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) any accurate account on the subject of which he has spoken, as the accounts are now under investigation. As I myself have not escaped a certain amount of blame and accusation, it would be very improper if I were to use my position in proposing these Estimates to say anything which would in the least prejudice whatever decision the House might come to when all the facts are before it; but I may say this with great confidence — that I have not the slightest idea that anything that can possibly happen will in the least affect the Estimates that have been laid before us on the authority of the Post Office. I will not detain the Committee many moments, and after the long and interesting discussion we have had, they will not expect me to attempt to do so, or to enter into any long discussion; in fact, if I began to reply to the points raised I should have to enter into an animated defence of every tax that has been imposed. I certainly have great complaint to make of the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence), who accuses me of using him very ill; because, when he seduced my simplicity into following his advice, he led me on until I have sustained a severe and lamentable defeat under his auspices.

He now accuses me because I did not persevere in the same disastrous course. I am accused of over-sanguine Estimates. The Chancellor of the Exchequer never hits the golden mean in that respect. The future is unknown to me, although some other hon. Gentlemen seem to have a clear apprehension of it. At present, I believe, we are said to be in the full tide of prosperity; but the Estimates we have taken show no increase on the £800,000 we took last year. That, I think, is not an unreasonable prospect. Of course, circumstances may happen either way. There may be an additional flood of prosperity, and I might have to stand in this House before the bar of public opinion next year to answer for not having been sufficiently sanguine. On the other hand, there may have been a great crash and catastrophe, when I may be severely blamed for having put the Estimates too high. That is the position which belongs to persons in my situation, and I accept it freely. I do not think there is anything else for me to answer. Hon. Gentlemen connected with the agricultural interest consider themselves neglected because they have been only treated as part of the community. When I consider the large amount the agricultural interest contributes to Schedules A and B, and when I consider the interest they have in the general prosperity and in the increase of trade which re-acts indirectly on those commodities which they produce, I cannot think they will believe themselves to be unfairly dealt with because I have not addressed myself to any of their pet grievances, or because they think they have been deprived of large sums of money in taxes which really fall on the consumer. Nothing is farther from my wishes than to treat them with any unfairness. The same thing I will say about brewers, who seem to think themselves very ill-used because we have not attended to their recommendation to take off the licence duty. It appears to me they are in a dilemma, from which there is no mode of extrication. If that licence duty falls on the consumer it does not injure the brewer. If it falls on the brewer it is a large payment exacted from him out of his own resources before he is allowed to commence the exercise of his trade. That creates in his favour a qualified monopoly, which tends to diminish the number of competitors, and so to keep up the price of the commodity he sells, and therefore in one way or another it appears quite certain that the brewer must get value for his outlay. On the whole I have reason to be grateful to the Committee for the manner in which they have received this Budget. I hope they will allow me to pass the Resolutions through Committee to-night, and as they will not be reported until after the Recess, the House will have full time to consider them. As to the question of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Barnett) I apprehend that the income tax incurred under the late Income Tax Act, although that Act has now expired, will have to be paid at the rate fixed by that Act, and all income tax that has accrued since the expiration of the Act should be paid at the reduced rate which is intended to be imposed by the new Act. I think, therefore, that if the Committee should please to pass the Resolutions to-night, those who have to make the reductions will be justified in making them in accordance with the lower scale.

(1.) Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for one year, commencing on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, for and in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act passed in the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, for granting to Her Majesty Duties on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices, the following Rates and Duties (that is to say):

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of all such Property, Profits, and Gains (except those chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act), the Rate or Duty of Three Pence;

And for and in respect of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value thereof:

In England the Rate or Duty of One Penny Halfpenny; and

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Rate or Duty of One Penny Farthing;

Subject to the provisions contained in section twelve of the Act of thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth Victoria, chapter twenty, for the exemption of Persons whose whole Income from every source is under One Hundred Pounds a-year, and relief of those whose Income is under Three Hundred Pounds a-year.

(2.) Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, on and after the eighth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now charged on the articles under-mentioned, the following Duties of Customs shall be charged thereon, on importation into Great Britain or Ireland, viz.:

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. C. E. LEWIS, who had a Notice on the Paper to move "That this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee," said, the dates fixed upon by the Bill, August 9 being the first and September 20 the last, would prove inconvenient to all parties concerned. It was within the experience of persons connected with the law that the Home Circuit had sat into the first week of September, and the Northern Circuit into the first and second week of the same month, and this was sufficient to show the inconvenience that might be occasioned both to barristers and solicitors, who would be attending the Assize Courts when they were wanted in the revision Courts. At present two months were allowed for the printing of each Parliamentary register, but by this Bill little more than a month was given for this purpose. The alteration proposed carried back the qualifying vote in a borough from January to 30th November, the result of which would be that many persons in business who might be dissolving partnership—seeing that such dissolutions generally took place at Christmas—could not be put upon the register until after three years of occupation. The hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General), in introducing the Bill, had made a great point of the power which the municipal voter would have of an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas; but that power of appeal was a mere delusion, because the municipal register had to be conclusively settled before the 1st of November, and it was to be conclusively voted upon on the 1st of November except as regards casual vacancies, while the Court of Common Pleas did not sit until the 2nd. That was a most serious blot on the Bill. What he proposed in order to get rid of that objection was this—that the election of town councillors should be held on the 1st of December, and the election of mayors on the 9th of December. The whole of Michaelmas Term would then be available for municipal appeals; and the Bill would be a vitality and a reality, instead of a delusion and a sham. This Bill required the most careful attention of a Committee upstairs. The Bill dealt with the lodger franchise in a most remarkable manner. It proposed a perfect revolution in the lodger franchise. In order to acquire the lodger franchise a man must occupy separately and as sole tenant for 12 months lodgings which unfurnished would be of the yearly value of £10. In other words, there were five leading elements or conditions necessary to be proved to give reality to this franchise. The lodger had to make a claim; he was bound to go either in person or by agent to prove his claim. The Revising Barristers in London had adopted the most prudent and favourable view of the law. They held Courts in the evening to suit the convenience of the labouring classes; they laid it down that it was not necessary for the claimant to go himself to prove his claim, but any person competent to give reasonable information as to the character of the tenancy should be entitled to give evidence, and the best construction should be put upon it. But there had been great laxity; there was a great falling off in the lodger claims, and what the Attorney General now proposed to do in this Amended Bill was by Clause 5—if a person made a claim as lodger, and he was upon the register for the last year, and if he claimed for the same lodgings, he should be prima facie assumed to be a lodger for the next year, and have a vote accordingly. The consequence would be that in large constituencies, like Westminster, a start being made with a register of 5,000 or 6,000 lodgers, and unscrupulous agents having to fill up the list of lodgers for the next year on the basis of last year's list, it would be impossible to test those lists of lodger claimants. He was of opinion, therefore, that the Bill ought to be referred to a Committee upstairs, in order that the opinion of Revising Barristers might be taken, who would furnish information as to the way in which legislation on the subject should be carried into effect. Although, he might add, it was pretended that the Bill would affect only borough revisions, it would bring about a complete revolution of the whole system as regarded counties, and he could not understand why a Revising Barrister of seven years' standing should be so insulted as not to be deemed fit to be allowed a discretion in deciding whether a man was to pay costs or not. He hoped also the Attorney General would explain the reason why certain dates had been introduced into the Bill. He would suggest that the election of town councillors should be held on the 1st of December, instead of the 1st of November in every year, and that the Parliamentary revision system at present in existence should remain unaltered. In conclusion, he moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Charles Lewis,)—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL appealed to the Speaker as to whether it was competent for the hon. and learned Member to alter the Motion of which he had given Notice, more especially as the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had on a previous occasion made the present Motion, which was then rejected by the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, he did not think the present Motion was identical with that submitted by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that although the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite was not a Member of very long standing in the House, yet he had shown a singular acquaintance with its forms, as far as they were capable of being used for the purpose of obstruction. The hon. and learned Member had delivered the very same speech, as far as nine-tenths of it were concerned, three times at least—once on the second reading of the Bill, once on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, and again on the present occasion. Therefore, he repeated that the forms of the House had been used for the purpose of obstructing this Bill. All the objections raised by the hon. and learned Member were merely objections to the clauses, and should properly be dealt with in Committee. One of the great objections taken to the Bill was that the whole revision system of the counties of England was to be altered for the purpose of bringing the Parliamentary and Municipal revision of the boroughs into harmony one with the other. Now, he and his hon. Friend (Mr. Hibbert) had received a great many communications and suggestions on the subject, but not a single objection from the counties of England. Then it was said that some inconvenience would be found in the period fixed for revision—namely, the time from the 9th of August to the 15th of September, because some of the Revising Barristers would then be engaged in the work of Assizes. But all would not be so engaged, and there was no necessity to commence the work on the 9th of August. All that was required was that it should be done in the interval between that date and the 15th of September, and he could see no real difficulty in that requirement. Then the hon. Gentleman complained of the manner in which the Bill dealt with the lodger franchise, which, he said, gave an opening to fraud on the part of unscrupulous agents. The fact was the lodger was required to make his claim in a certain form, every necessary ingredient in the qualification was carefully ascertained by a Schedule set out in the Bill, and the lodgers were to be set out in a separate list so as to give every proper facility to those who might make an objection. And that was what was called by the hon. and learned Member a fraudulent and indirect mode of taking the lodger on the register. With regard to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member to alter the date of the municipal elections to the 1st of December, the present arrangement had been fixed to suit the general convenience of the great towns interested in the working of this Bill, a large proportion of them having desired him to adhere to the present date. He trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not persist in his Motion.

MR. HUNT said, that as the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had entered into an arrangement with the hon. and learned Attorney General to which he himself was a party, under which the Motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee had been withdrawn, he could not support the present Motion, although he thought that the measure was susceptible of considerable improvement. He hoped that, if the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. E. Lewis) did not succeed in his Motion, the Attorney General would agree to go no further with the Bill that night after the House had gone into Committee pro forma. An opportunity would then be given to hon. Members to consider the suggestions which had been made with regard to the printing of the register.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought that the observations which the hon. and learned Attorney General had made on the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. E. Lewis) were quite uncalled for. It was obvious that, if the House went into Committee on a Bill of this sort, the power of the Government told three-fold upon the progress of the measure in dealing with any objections such as the hon. Member had urged, compared with what it did before going into Committee. During the last three Sessions he had witnessed too many struggles in Committee; and he was coming very much to the opinion which had been suggested to Committees on Public Business, that it would be far better to refer such Bills to Committees up-stairs; because those struggles in Committee of the Whole House did no credit to the House. They were ineffectual for the purpose of changing a Bill materially. The House ought not to change the principle of a Bill in Committee, and they did not change the principle of Bills in Committee; but they did this—they wasted the time of the House in Committee. He thought it, therefore, better and more legitimate that use should be made of the forms of the House before Bills went into Committee, in order to argue such amendments involving principle as the promoters of the Bills might be unwilling to accept. What was the fact in the present instance? This Bill had been essentially changed in many particulars, and it was now admitted on this stage of the Bill that the Schedule fixing all the dates was introduced originally by a mistake of the printer.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: No, no. Objections were taken to the original Schedule, and a new Schedule was substituted; but instead of the new Schedule being in the re-delivered Bill the old Schedule was printed over again.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Then it came to this, that a double alteration had been made, as the Bill was delivered to Members. Therefore what he had said was doubly true, because the hon. and learned Gentleman had intended to accept certain alterations as to the dates, which were suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), but by some mistake of a subordinate a Paper was distributed to the Members of this House, which implied that the hon. and learned Gentleman had not accepted those Amendments. Afterwards the hon. and learned Gentleman substituted a corrected Paper, and now, for the first time, this House was distinctly informed of the arrangement which he had come to after hearing the objections to the Bill. He thought, therefore, that the hon. Member for Londonderry was perfectly justified by the forms of the House; by the system of debate which was generally acted upon, and by the recent experience of the House, in suggesting that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. Without urging the hon. Member to a division, he should most certainly vote with him if he thought fit to divide.

The House divided:—Ayes 110; Noes 38: Majority 72.

Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Greene.)

MR. NEWDEGATE inquired of the Attorney General whether, if the Speaker left the Chair, progress would be at once reported.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he proposed to make as much progress with the Bill as he could.

MR. RATHBONE said, that the object of the opponents of the Bill was to prevent it passing in time for the lists of this year.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the opposition to the Bill was perfectly bond fide, and the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. E. Lewis), who had more experience on the subject than any Member of that House, believed that it would be unworkable.

MR. RYLANDS appealed to the Government to agree to report Progress as soon as they went into Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, there was no opposition to the first two clauses of the Bill; and when they came to the third he would be quite willing to report Progress.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the proposal of the Government a fair one.

MR. GREENE said, he would withdraw the Motion for the adjournment, but he objected to being lectured by a man like the hon Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) ["Oh, oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I understood that the hon. Member rose to withdraw the Motion; he is not entitled to address the House a second time.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 21st April.

(Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Childers, Mr. Arthur Peel.)

[BILL 121.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."

The House divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 23; Majority 80.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Clause 4 (Appointment of Railway Commissioners).

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved in page 2, line 30, after "experience in Railway business," to insert "and not more than two Assistant Commissioners."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 10 (Explanation of 17 & 18 Vict. cap. 31, s. 2, as to through traffic).

MR. PIM moved to insert in page 5, line 14, after "through rates"

"And shall also include the due and reasonable forwarding by every Railway Company and Canal Company which uses, maintains, or works, or is a party to using, maintaining, or working steam vessels for the purpose of carrying on a communication between any port at which the said Railway Company or Canal Company has a terminus, and any other port in the United Kingdom, at the request of the owners of other steam vessels plying regularly between any port in the United Kingdom and any port at which the said Railway Company or Canal Company has a terminus, of through traffic to and from such vessels, at through rates, tolls, or fares."

He stated that the object of the Amendment was to secure proper competition, particularly in respect to the Irish traffic.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that he had come reluctantly to the conclusion that he must object to the Amendment. There was no reciprocity. It was proposed that a line of steamers should have a right to forward goods at through rates all over large systems of railways.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 32, after the word "board," to insert the words "or chamber of commerce, or any other association of merchants or traders composed of not less than twenty members."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. PEASE opposed the Amendment on the ground that such bodies were irresponsible. If they admitted Chambers, of Commerce, they must admit Chambers of Agriculture, and there would be no end to complaints.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL pointed out that Chambers of Commerce not incorporated could not sue or be made to pay costs. Those that were incorporated could apply as a public body; but the unincorporated chambers were wholly irresponsible, and they would have no power to bind the minority. He should oppose the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 69: Majority 44.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday 21st April.

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HEADLAM, Bill to amend "The Medical Act, 1858," ordered to be brought in by Mr. HEADLAM and Sir HENRY SELWYN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 127.]

METALLIFEROUS MINES RATING BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN ST. AUBYN, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Rating of Metalliferous Mines, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN ST. AUBYN, Mr. BRYDGES WILLYAMS, Mr. ARTHUR P. VIVIAN, and Mr. PEASE.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to enable Burghs in Scotland of twenty-five thousand inhabitants and upwards to appoint Stipendiary Magistrates, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary BRUCE, and Mr. ADAM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 129.]

ENTAILED AND SETTLED ESTATES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to alter and amend the Law relating to Entails and the Settlement of Estates in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary BRUCE, and Mr. ADAM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 130.]

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock till Monday 21st April.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 21st April, 1873.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Limited Owners Improvements * (65).

Committee—Report—Mutiny; Marine Mutiny *.

(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was surprised that the noble Marquess the Under Secretary of State for War had not taken an opportunity of giving an explanation of the alterations proposed in this now historical Bill. These alterations were very important, and he thought they should not be assented to without their full purport being made known to their Lordships. His attention had been drawn to the matter through several Petitions which had been sent to him for presentation to the House.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE begged to remind the noble Marquess that when moving the second reading of the Bill he called attention in a few words to the alteration in what used to be the 40th clause in the Mutiny Act. Under that clause the soldier was exempted from the liability which devolved upon every man to support his wife and his children, whether legitimate or illegitimate. By the 107th section of the Bill now before their Lordships it was proposed to put an end to that exemption, and to render the soldier liable in respect of his wife and of his children in the same way as all others of Her Majesty's subjects; but, in order to secure that the public might not be deprived of the soldier's services, the War Department had felt obliged to limit the principle established by Clause 107 to this extent:—First it was proposed that, in the case of non-commissioned officers of a rank not lower than that of sergeant, the amount for which the man should be liable should be 6*d.* a day, and that in the case of privates and of non-commissioned officers under the rank of sergeant the amount should be 3*d.* a day. Another limitation was in the shape of a Proviso that where the putative father of a child was resident outside the petty sessions district in which the mother resided, and in which the summons against him was to be heard, money sufficient to pay his travelling expenses to the latter place should be lodged in the hands of the commanding officer. In some cases this would no doubt, prevent poor women enforcing the law; but, on the other hand, if the expenses were to be paid by the public, there might be collusion between the soldier and persons residing in a place to which he desired to make a little trip. It was the duty of the War Office to protect the public against a conspiracy, and at the same time to take care that the soldier did not escape the consequences of his folly. He had not thought it necessary to go very fully into the matter on the second reading, because from the thin attendance on that occasion—particularly on the opposite benches—he did not think the proposed alterations excited any very great amount of interest.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought it would have been desirable to print the Bill with the Amendments before they were asked to discuss them in Committee. The restrictions to the liability under the 107th clause were very important, and it might be that they amounted practically to a denial of a boon which Parliament by that section would purport to grant. There had been so many instances lately of the imperfect manner in which Bills were drawn that it was desirable to have clauses, and amendments in clauses, very closely looked to.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND asked whether there was any reason why the Bill should not be reprinted? The alterations were very important. He did not understand who was to pay the expenses of the soldier's journey.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE replied that if the claim against the soldier was made out the expenses would be recovered from the soldier in the shape of stoppages; but if it failed the money lodged by the mother would be forfeited, as having been applied to the expenses that had been incurred.

LORD CAIRNS asked whether he was right in supposing that if a poor woman deposited what to her was a considerable sum of money—perhaps two sovereigns—to pay the soldier's expenses from a distant place, and made good her claim on the hearing before the magistrates, she was only to recover the money by instalments, procured from the man in the shape of small stoppages of 3*d.* a day? If this were so he thought an Amendment was required, because such a provision would, in many cases, render the section a dead letter.

The Marquess of Lansdowne

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that where the soldier was at a distance no doubt the section might often prove a dead letter; but he did not see how that was to be prevented except at a risk of loss and inconvenience to the public. The amendment of the 40th section of the Mutiny Act had long been canvassed, and all these matters had been carefully considered, and there was no help for it. This Bill had come up from the other House; and on the second reading no objection was made to it by any of their Lordships. It was absolutely necessary that the Mutiny Bill should be passed without much further delay.

LORD CAIRNS asked when the existing Mutiny Act expired?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, on the 25th inst., and therefore it was essential that this Bill should receive the Royal Assent on the 24th.

House in Committee accordingly.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> To-morrow.

MARINE MUTINY BILL considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> To-morrow.

BASTARDY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Commons Amendments considered.

Order of the Day for resuming the debate on the Motion for consideration of the Commons' Amendments to the Lords' Amendments and the Commons' Reasons for disagreeing to some of the Amendments made by the Lords, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had introduced an Amendment to make valid orders made by magistrates in ignorance of the slip in the Bill of last year. He thought this Amendment, though right in itself, might bear rather hardly on persons against whom such orders had been made, and who might have appealed against them, but had not done so because they knew they were invalid.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not think the objection of his noble Friend well founded. The effect of his Amendment would only be to make valid orders which but for the slip in the Bill of last year would have been valid. It would not make valid orders which were invalid on any other ground, and therefore it would work no injustice; because if there were no such Amendment the only effect would be in the case of persons whose orders were invalid by reason of the slip in the Bill of last year to oblige such persons to institute proceedings under this Act.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the explanation of his noble and learned Friend removed his objection.

Further debate resumed accordingly.

Motion agreed to; Commons Amendments and Reasons considered; Amendments to which the Commons disagree, not insisted on; Commons Amendments to Lords Amendments, agreed to, with Amendments; consequential Amendments made; and Bill returned to the Commons.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock,
'till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

Third Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 1) * [95]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 2) * [96]; Portpatrick Harbour * [61]; Land Drainage Provisional Order * [97]; East India Stock Dividend Redemption * [102], and passed.

EAST INDIA COMPANY—THE EAST INDIA STOCK DIVIDEND REDEMPTION BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD, according to private Notice, asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been drawn to the report of the proceedings of the Court of Proprietors of the East India Company a few days ago, from which it appears that exception is taken to the immediate transfer to the Secretary of State for India of the Security Fund which was set up by the Act of 1833, in anticipation of the time when the proprietors would be repaid the amount of their stock, which would be the 30th of June next year?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend I have to say that my attention has been drawn to the matter to which he has alluded. The principal objection taken to the Bill as it originally stood has been met in its essential features by an Amendment which was inserted the night before the Recess on the Motion of the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney); and, with reference to the closing of the books and the possibility of requiring services from the Company without expressly providing for their cost, my hon. Friend will, I hope, take my assurance that nothing will be done by the Secretary of State in Council which will not be both just and considerate towards the last representatives of so august a body as the great old East India Company.

SANITARY ACTS—MINERAL WORKS. QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it has been brought under his consideration that by the construction of the Nuisances Removal Act, 18 & 19 Vic. c. 121, and of the 29 & 30 Vic. c. 90, all works for manufacturing the produce of ores and minerals are exempt from the provisions of those Acts; and, whether he intends to introduce any Bill for the amendment and consolidation of the Sanitary Acts during the present Session?

MR. HIBBERT, in reply, said, the attention of the Local Government Board had been called to the fact that, under the construction put upon the existing Sanitary Acts, works for manufacturing the produce of ores and minerals were exempt from their provisions, and the fact would be remembered whenever the Government introduced their measure for amending and consolidating the Sanitary Acts; but, in case they should not be able to do so during the present Session, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire (Sir Charles Adderley) would be disposed to meet the case by inserting a clause in the Bill which he had already submitted to the House.

UNIVERSITY TESTS (DUBLIN) (No. 3)

(Mr. Fawcett, Dr. Lyon Playfair, Mr. Plunket.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FAWCETT, in moving "That the Bill be now read a second time," said: Mr. Speaker—It has so often fallen to my lot to speak on the subject of University education, that it will only be necessary for me this evening to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes. If for no other reason, I shall be brief on the present occasion, because I am anxious to avoid, as far as possible, all topics which may possibly lead to re-creminations about the past. My sole wish and purpose is to secure as early a passing of this Bill as possible, because a practical object is to be gained by its passing before the 8th of May, or, at any rate, before the end of that month. In order, therefore, to pledge myself that I wish to get the Bill as expeditiously through as possible, I wish to avoid saying a single word that might lead to controversy; but it is due to the House that I should state the exact position of the question at the present moment, and how it has come to pass that the Bill is different from that which I originally introduced, a portion of which has been abandoned. Some three or four weeks since it was intimated to the promoters of the Bill that if they would abandon one portion of it—namely, that which proposed to constitute a Council of Organization for the future, for the reform of the Government of Trinity College and the University of Dublin, the Government would facilitate the passing of the remainder of the Bill—namely, that which related to the abolition of religious tests. In deciding to accept that offer of the Government, we were influenced by three considerations

Of course, it is scarcely necessary for me to remark that we abandoned a portion of the Bill reluctantly, for we still retained the opinion that it would have been better, if it had been possible, that the Bill should be passed in its entirety. We were, however, met by these considerations. In the first place we knew perfectly well, from the experience of last Session, that if the Government did not facilitate the passing of the Bill by giving us some Government nights, there could not be the smallest chance of the Bill becoming law in the present Session. For what happened last year? The second reading of a Bill more complete than the present one was passed by an overwhelming majority—a majority of four to one—before Easter. The promoters of the Bill did everything that independent Members could do to get the Bill into Committee; but the Government objected to the whole Bill; they therefore rendered the promoters of the Bill no assistance, and the result was that, though the promoters availed themselves of every opportunity, we were unable to get the Bill forward. That being the case, the promoters of the Bill felt that if they preserved it intact it might be eventually lost, even after the second reading had been carried by an overwhelming majority—while they thought that if, on the other hand, they accepted the offer of the Government and confined the Bill simply to an abolition of tests, it was almost certain that with their assistance the measure would pass. The friends of the Bill were also influenced by the consideration that they had always regarded the abolition of tests as the most important portion of the measure, and that that part of the question which would be left unsettled might possibly, as he should presently show, be settled at some future time without the direct intervention of Parliament. Thirdly, there was another consideration which greatly influenced the supporters of the Bill. The abolition of tests was not a theoretical reform, but a reform of a practical and an immediate kind; for they could not conceal from themselves the fact that last year one of the most eminent students in Trinity College, Dublin, had by intellectual merit won a valuable prize which he could have enjoyed if this Bill had passed. Therefore, they felt that if from any private preference of their own

they did not accept the offer of the Government, it was quite possible that in the Fellowship examination which was about to be held in Trinity College, they might, by delaying the passing of this measure, be inflicting great injury on distinguished and deserving students. The Motion for the second reading is to be met by two Resolutions, one of them brought forward by my hon. Friend the Member for the county of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) and the other by my hon. Friend the Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue). Happily, although I may not agree with the spirit or intention of either of these Resolutions, yet it seems to me they are so entirely irrelevant to the Bill that, although I differ from them, it is scarcely necessary to enter into any controversy with my hon. Friends. The Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for the County of Galway affirms that, in order to settle the question of Irish University education, it is necessary that a Royal Commission should be appointed to take evidence from Academic Bodies, and from those persons in Ireland who are most interested in the subject. Now, admitting the necessity of appointing such a Commission, there is not the slightest reason why my hon. Friend should withhold his support from the present Bill; for surely my hon. Friend will agree with me that it does not require a Royal Commission to decide whether we shall apply to Ireland the same legislation which has been applied to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The principle of the abolition of religious tests has been already affirmed by overwhelming majorities in this House. I cannot, therefore, agree with my hon. Friend that a Commission is necessary to inquire into the state of University education in Ireland; but even if I did, that would not afford the slightest reason for delaying for a single hour the passing of a Bill for the abolition of religious tests. As to the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Tralee, it is equally irrelevant to the present measure, and hon. Members who cordially endorse every syllable of that Resolution may, nevertheless, give an emphatic vote in favour of the Bill. For what does my hon. Friend ask the House to declare? He asks the House to declare that the abolition of religious tests will not settle the question of Irish University education. Who thinks it will?

He cannot suppose that the Government thinks that the passing of this Bill will settle the question of Irish University education. We have entered into no arrangement or understanding that the question should not again be re-opened. Therefore, if the Government should desire again to enter upon the subject of Irish University education, it will be able to do so next Session, with just as much readiness and freedom as if this Bill had never been passed; and as far as I myself and those Friends who are acting with me are concerned, the best pledge we can possibly give to the hon. Member for Tralee that we do not consider the abolition of tests to be a settlement of the question is this—that we have reluctantly abandoned a portion of our Bill; and we would not have abandoned that portion of the Bill unless we had been compelled to do so, as it were, by the circumstances and the necessities of the case. Therefore my hon. Friend cannot hope to have a more practical or satisfactory assurance that we do not consider that the simple abolition of tests is a settlement of the question of Irish University education. If I am asked in what direction, in my judgment, Irish University reform is likely to proceed in the future after religious tests have been abolished, I answer that I feel it would be excessively hazardous and presumptuous in me to venture an opinion on the subject. In the first place, it may possibly happen that the subject will not have to be dealt with in this Parliament, but in a new Parliament; and who can venture to predict what will be the opinion of a new Parliament on the question? Again, it may very possibly happen that if the authorities of Trinity College and the University of Dublin act during the next year with the same sagacity and the same liberality which have distinguished their action during the past two or three years, they may to a great extent, take the subject out of the hands of this House. They may do so by preparing a set of statutes of their own so liberal, so wise, so enlightened, that this House may consider that the best thing that we can do for University education in Ireland is to leave the question in the hands of so distinguished an academical body, and simply move an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to assent to the statutes so wisely and liberally proposed by the authorities of the College and University themselves. Before I sit down I wish to say a few words with a view to prevent myself being, in the slightest degree, misunderstood. I hope my Catholic Friends in this House will believe me when I say that I am as ready to admit as they can be, that Catholics in Ireland, and those residents there who are not members, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, have suffered, and are suffering at the present time under a most serious grievance with regard to University education. If I had not felt this, why should I have striven during almost every year that I have been in Parliament to force this subject upon the attention of the House? The difference between my Catholic Friends and me is not as to the existence of the grievance; the difference between us is as to the nature of the grievance and as to the proper remedy of which that grievance admits. We think that if you abolish all religious disabilities, if you do everything that possibly can be done to efface the traces of past inequality, without infringing the principle of academic freedom, and without introducing the principle of political domination; if, in fact, you lay the foundation which in the future will give every Catholic and every Nonconformist in Ireland the same opportunity of obtaining honours and emoluments in University education as is possessed by people who belong to the Episcopalian Church, that then this House will have done all that it can do in order to secure educational equality. But my hon. Friends the Catholic Members of this House put a different interpretation upon the grievance under which they say they are suffering, and they also suggest a different remedy. They say that they shall never enjoy justice as long as by endowments we encourage the mixing together in education of Catholics, Protestants, and people of different religions. Well, if that is their grievance, all I can say is that such grievance admits of but one remedy, and that is to carry out in University education the principle of concurrent endowment. But in striving after concurrent endowment my hon. Friends know—far better than I can tell them—that they are striving after what there is not the smallest chance of their obtaining from this House. They may be misled by some phrases on the evening of a great party division, when the rival parties are struggling for their votes; but after what has recently taken place, can any reasonable man believe that there is the slightest chance of concurrent endowment being conceded to them? For what has taken place? Nothing can be more positive or emphatic than the assurances of the Prime Minister on this subject, in his memorable speech at the close of the debate on the Irish University Bill. I venture to say that much as that speech was admired, there was no portion of it which gave such entire satisfaction to the English and Scotch supporters of his Government as those sentences in which he declared, in language that could not be mistaken, that the day for concurrent endowment had gone by for ever. But what took place on the opposite side of the House? The language of the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the Opposition was not so emphatic or precise. He let fall some doubtful phrases on the question of concurrent endowment. What was the result? It was perfectly well known that alarm and dismay spread through the ranks of his party, and in order that he might not be misunderstood, the right hon. Gentleman took care in a speech which he made a few days afterwards to prove to his party and to the country that between himself and the Prime Minister there was not on the question of concurrent endowment the slightest difference of opinion. It is scarcely necessary for me to say anything further, except to thank the Government for having done everything in their power, in accordance with their promise, to facilitate the passing of this Bill; and to commend with confidence the measure to the favourable consideration of the House in the belief that, if it should become law, it will introduce a great reform, remove a crying injustice, and place Irish University education in a more satisfactory position than it has ever yet occupied.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in moving as an Amendment the following Resolution:—

"That this House fully recognises the importance of an early settlement of the question of University Education in Ireland, but is of opinion that such legislation can be more satisfactorily entered upon after the House has been put into possession of full information as to the opinions and wishes of the several Academic Bodies existing in Ireland, and of the Irish people generally, especially of the classes practically interested in the question, by means of a Royal Commission, with instructions to take evidence and report before the opening of the next Session of Parliament."

said, that in attentively listening during the last three Sessions to the discussions which had taken place in the House on the subject of University education in Ireland, and in reading the reports of the previous debates in Hansard, he often found himself pausing to ask whether they really lived under a constitutional Government, in which theoretically, at least, the consent of the governed was necessary to the making of the laws, or whether, on this subject they had not gone back to earlier times, when either the word of the monarch or that of an oligarchy governing in his name imposed its will upon a reluctant people.

He did not suppose that the most uncandid or the most willing self-deceiver could persuade himself that the University reforms which the House of Commons had so long been endeavouring to force on Ireland met with the approval of that country, or that the Bill now before the House, in its third scene of transformation, in any considerable degree responded to their wants and wishes. Well, but it might be said Ireland was only a portion of the Empire, and she must be content to be bound by the majority in Parliament, whether she liked it or not. As a general rule, he did not for a moment dispute that proposition. In matters that were in themselves indifferent, as well as in the greater questions of peace and war, or of colonial and foreign policy which concerned the Empire at large, no one denied it. But in matters that touched the interests of Ireland alone, that trench upon the religion and the honour of her people, but did not in any way affect the interests of England or Scotland, it was a different thing; and notwithstanding the threatenings they had heard, both inside and outside that House, as to the necessity of teaching the Irish a lesson of obedience and submission, he believed that in cooler moments Parliament would shrink from enacting laws on a domestic subject, contrary to the advice of the

The history of this country was full of warnings against the political pedantry of legislating on abstract theories of right, without taking account of what were scoffingly called sentimental grievances, or studying the characters and the prejudices of nations. No man could pretend to the character of a statesman unless he was careful that his measures harmonized with the traditions of the people, and had their sure foundation in the loyal approval of the public. It was the neglect of this that had wrecked the present Session, and he should have thought that even the most adventurous spirit would have felt inclined to pause, and ask himself the question whether the Government and the House of Commons had not signally failed to measure with accuracy the depth of Irish feeling in these matters. The torrents of contempt and insult which had been poured out on the country by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman), and by the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), imitated as they were in the petty sarcasms of inferior orators, had caused the Irish pulse to beat more tumultuously than for many a year, and that of itself constituted a cogent argument for moderation and inquiry. By his Amendment, therefore, he asked the House to pause and think what they were legislating about, and not, as a sort of homage to the repealers of the 25th clause of the English Education Act, to unite in passing in hot haste a measure which, whether it was in itself a right or wrong one, could have no perceptible effect on Catholic grievances, and was calculated only to blind and deceive the public. From the way in which the measure had been pushed forward to the detriment of all other public business, it might be supposed that there was some crying evil that it was calculated to remedy. The fact was, however, that the tests which now existed at Oxford and Cambridge were far more disabling and onerous than they were at Trinity College. Yet he was persuaded, notwithstanding all the discussions on the subject, that there was a firm impression diffused throughout the country that the portals of Trinity College bristled with tests which forbade the entrance of Dissenters and Roman Catholics, and that hon. Members who had charge of the Bill were gallantly fighting against an exclusiveness which had no parallel in the English Universities. Even the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), who spoke as an organ for the Nonconformists, was so imperfectly acquainted with the facts, that he supposed that tests on the taking of ordinary degrees had only been abolished since the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland. He had never known so large a club used to knock down so small a fly as the present Bill. A good deal more than half a century before the English Universities even mooted the question of tests, Trinity College had received and educated and conferred degrees on numbers of Roman Catholics and Dissenters, just as freely as upon Episcopal Protestants. Nearly 20 years ago, a considerable number of Scholarships were thrown open, and at the present moment tests were imposed only on the Provost, the Fellows, and the Foundation scholars. He wished, therefore, to state as clearly as he could the exact position in which the matter stood, in order that the country might not be misled as to the value of the Bill in the settlement of the difficulty.

He would show that if, by any chance, a Dissenter or a Roman Catholic should be elected to a Fellowship at the next examination in the course of the present summer, by no possibility could he become a member of the Governing Body of the University, or in the smallest degree influence its policy or proceedings in a less time than between 30 and 40 years. Up to 1840 there were 25 Fellowships in Trinity College. In that year, however, by a Queen's Letter, 10 others were added; but as two had since been suppressed, there were now only 33 Fellowships, and of these the seven Seniors, together with the Provost, constituted the Governing Board, who controlled the finances, regulated the affairs of the College, and appointed all the Professors. Now, in the 20 years from 1853 to 1873, there had been 15 elections to Fellowships, and as the oldest of the Junior Fellows was appointed on the new foundation in 1841, it followed that although he had been for 32 years a Fellow he had not the smallest influence on the governing policy of the College. The effect, also, of the increased number of Fellowships on the age of the Governing Council had yet to be tried, because the seven Seniors were now taken from a body of 33 instead of, as before the Queen's Letter, from a body of 25. There was another point to be considered, and it was this—Vacancies in the Fellowships occasionally occurred from the acceptance of College livings; but as College clerical patronage had been done away with, that stimulant to the retirement of Fellows was now at an end, and his belief was, that the period of the service of a Junior Fellow would in future very likely exceed rather than fall short of 40 years, so that if the gentleman, whose case was cited as a hardship by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), were elected a Fellow next June he could not take any part in the government of the University for two generations, and certainly that state of things did not present a very crying Catholic grievance to Parliament. A glance at the manner in which the Fellowships had gone since 1840—within the lifetime of most of the present Senior Fellows—would illustrate the point. The Provost became a Fellow in 1824, remained 19 years a Junior, and was elected a Senior exactly 30 years ago, thus extending his career to very nearly half-a-century. The service of the others as Junior Fellows before they got on the Governing Body extended as follows:—15, 16, 19, 18, 23, 26, 29, 29, 31, and 30 years, when the youngest of the Seniors was elected—the well-known and highly-distinguished Dr. Jellett. The present Junior Fellows had served as follows:—one of them 32, and the others respectively 31, 30, 29, 29, 28, 28, 27, 26, 25, 25 years, so that if the junior of the number who was elected in 1848—that is, 25 years ago—became a member of the Governing Board within the next 15 years, he might think himself lucky.

But the hon. Member for Brighton, having given up his own inadequate scheme for reforming Trinity College, hoped that Trinity College would reform itself. All experience showed that no profession, or corporation, or College was at all likely to move in that direction. They had, however, a test to put to Trinity College, which was this—In consequence of the abolition of the clerical patronage, extra revenue to the extent of £5,000 a-year, had been placed at the disposal of the Governing Body.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

To what purpose would they devote that sum? They might use it to procure the retirement of some of the gentlemen who composed the Governing Body. Would they do so? He had no desire to say anything that was not respectful of the Senior Fellows, but he could not help remarking that the work of the College was done by two or three Fellows, for reasons connected with age, health, and other matters to which he need not further allude. There was another purpose to which they might apply the £5,000 a-year. They might endow Chairs for some of their Catholic compatriots for whose welfare they had lately manifested so much solicitude. He hoped that if the subject came up again next year inquiry would be made as to what had been done with this revenue.

The next thing to which the abolition of tests applied was Scholarships. There were 70 Scholarships and 12 or 14 vacancies a-year. In the year 1855, owing to the exertions of the hon. and learned Member for Tipperary (Mr. Heron), a certain number of Scholarships were reserved for Roman Catholics without tests. He would not go into the question of how those Scholarships were filled up, but this he would say, that the supply was far more considerable than the demand, and the consequence was, that Churchmen had been appointed to some of the Scholarships in question, simply because there were no Roman Catholic candidates for them. The last appointment of a Roman Catholic to a Scholarship under that system was made in the year 1868. The House would therefore see that the proposed reform was not required by Roman Catholics or Dissenters so far as Scholarships were concerned. Then again there were two University studentships to be won without tests. They were worth £100 a-year each, and were tenable for seven years, but since 1859 they had been gained only three times by Roman Catholics.

Then as regarded the Professorships, which had long been free from tests, it seemed to have been the general rule to elect any Fellow or ex-Fellow to a Professorship in preference to any other person, and to give the appointments to the Senior of the Fellows or ex-Fellows who might apply for it. This did not look very favourable for the early success of Roman Catholics and Dissenters who were to be elected after the present Bill became law, for only last year the Chair of Moral Philosophy was filled up by the appointment of an ex-Fellow of 30 years' standing who had a parish in the country. Except, indeed, in the case of a gentleman who held a small post in the Medical School, he believed there was not a single Roman Catholic Professor, although there formerly was one—Mr. Slattery—whose appointment did duty in these debates pretty often before. The Governing Body had, however, an opportunity of electing a Professor last November to lecture on the important subject of Moral Philosophy—a subject the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government desired should not be taught in Trinity College, and well-advised the right hon. Gentleman was in inserting that provision in his Bill, as the facts he was about to state would show. The Board might have appointed any person—a Catholic in case one had come forward—and they did elect a most distinguished individual, who had been Fellow 30 years ago, and who, since that time, had been rector of a parish in the county Tyrone. Dr. M'Ivor based his claims to the Chair of Moral Philosophy chiefly in his exhaustive work called Religious Progress, which consisted of a series of University Sermons preached in the College chapel, and elaborated with copious notes, in which he reviewed the metaphysical systems of Comte, Buckle, Parker, Ferrier, Sir William Hamilton, and the late Dean Mansel, complaining that Dean Mansel, in his metaphysics, put restrictions upon religious criticism which did not apply to other subjects. Dr. M'Ivor then added—

"If we be debarred from criticism, we may as well acknowledge at once the infallibility of the Pope and the last Roman development—there is no God, and Mary is His mother."

Again, he said of the doctrine of transubstantiation—

"By a simple transference of objective value to a subjective process, sustained by logical deduction from indiscriminate words, the minister of the largest Church in Christendom first makes, then worships, and then"—the fact is too shocking to be less figuratively expressed—"receives" his God."

On the same point, Dr. M'Ivor added—

"Paganism has seldom surpassed this, and the indignation of every other Christian community is abundantly deserved."

Were Roman Catholics to be attracted by a University which selected as its latest Liberal Professor, a teacher who used such language as that respecting the holiest mysteries of their religion? Was that an example of the religious tenderness of Protestant Trinity for Roman Catholic consciences; and did the House now believe that it was only tests that kept them away? The hon. Member for Brighton, pleading last Session in a transcendent effort of memory for those whom he thought, probably with justice, the downtrodden people of India, denounced the proposal to charge the water rate even on persons making no use of the irrigation works as "paternal government with a vengeance." He would quote his very words, and then ask his hon. Friend if he had one standard of justice for the people of India and another for the people of Ireland?

"Is it any wonder," said he, "that the people are irritated, perplexed, or alarmed? It has been argued in justification of such a policy that the people who refuse to use the water do not know their own interests, and they ought to be compelled to do that which is good for them. This is paternal government with a vengeance."

Substitute the word "College" for the word "water" and the cases are precisely alike; yet now his hon. Friend seemed to argue that because the unfortunate Roman Catholics did not avail themselves of the education provided for them in Trinity College, they did not know their own interests, and ought to be compelled to do what was held by others to be good for them. Instead of allowing the Roman Catholics to have a College of their own, it was proposed to subject them to be lectured to by persons who spoke in the manner he had just described. Now, did the House deliberately believe that the abolition of tests in the case of a Fellowship which was thrown open about twice in every three years, and the addition of a few Scholarships, were reforms worthy of the fuss made about them, or that they would be regarded by the Irish people as anything but a mockery designed like the ink of the cuttle-fish to obscure and delude?

No, it was not tests that kept Roman Catholics away from Trinity College, but it was the Protestant tone and nature of that institution, of which they could not deprive it, and of which Roman Catholics did not ask that it should be deprived. It seemed to him most narrow and illogical to argue that because in Protestant England and Protestant Scotland we had of late years altered the course of our educational policy, we were, therefore, to thrust these new principles upon the Irish people who were not Protestants, and who utterly repudiated them. It was the consent of the governed alone that could make these vital changes even respectable. He thought they ought to be content with trying these experiments upon those who desired them. If they could prove to him that the majority of the Irish people desired that secular education should be perpetuated in that country to the exclusion of any other, and that henceforth religion should have nothing to do with learning, however he might regret it he would yet keep silent; but, on the other hand, if the contrary was notoriously the case, he would take leave to observe that in thus trampling upon natural justice and the equity of the Constitution, they were undermining the stability of the Empire, and were preparing for their children a heritage of disaster and disgrace. He would urge Nonconformists, if they desired University secularization, to deal with Oxford and Cambridge, where most of the Heads of Houses and Fellows were required to be members of the Church of England, and before legislating for Ireland to inquire how the case stood. The Amendment which he had placed upon the Table suggested that the House should pursue the course which was at once in accordance with the Constitution and with common sense. The House, he apprehended, was still very imperfectly acquainted with the question of higher education in Ireland. The tests that remained in Trinity College he had shown to have but an infinitesimal bearing on the large question to which they formed a prelude. He knew from the recent debate in the Senate, that there was a very wise, far-seeing, and Liberal element amongst the most experienced and distinguished men in Trinity College; and he thought it was important that their evidence should be put before the country in black and white, so that when Parliament legislated it might do so with full information before it and in a manner likely to be final and satisfactory. He wished the available testimony upon all sides to be brought out. It would be well to hear what the Presbyterians of the North had to say; what Magee College had to say; what representatives of the Catholic clergy had to say; what the Catholic University had to say; what independent Catholic laymen had to say; and what Trinity College itself had to say, not merely in the contradictory resolutions of its Governing Body, but in the testimony of its individual members. Such an inquiry need not occupy a considerable time. He, for one, did not question the desire of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to do what was just and right, but he did feel that he had been woefully misled. Whatever determination Parliament eventually came to, let it not be the legislation of a Parliamentum indoctum, properly so called. The Government Bill, a marvel of ingenuity, had miscarried, and, as far as could be judged from the remarks of a leading Member of the Ministry, they did not intend to trouble themselves further with the matter, but would leave it to the miserable reform inaugurated by the hon. Member for Brighton. Irish Members had with unanimity rejected a measure based on mistaken estimate of Irish feeling, and inquiry should precede a renewed attempt at legislation. That was no pretext for delay, since the Commission might easily report before next Session, and the Irish would thus at least have the compliment paid them of an inquiry into their own wishes.

As for the alleged definitive divorce between religion and education, the Non-conformists up to a few years ago objected to any Government interference with education, and the constant disputes in school boards on the manner of teaching religion—a lady at Manchester had recently spoken of certain passages from the Scriptures as “raw head and bloody bones mottoes”—showed that no such divorce had been effected.

It had been said that the Irish Members factiously joined with the Opposition to discredit the Government University Bill. No statement was ever more devoid of truth. It was with the deepest pain that the Irish Members, who acknowledged the services of the present Government, and especially of the right hon. Gentleman at its head, were compelled in their consciences to take the course they had pursued. The Leader of the Opposition had told them in pretty plain language that he intended to go to the country on what was called the “No Popery” cry. Now, he trusted that the Conservatives would go to the country on that cry, because he believed it would bring about such a union among the Roman Catholics of this country as would produce a marked effect upon that House. By an abuse of language, those Members who wished to obtain for the Irish people common justice in the matter of education were called Ultramontane Members. There was nothing like giving a name that everybody could remember, and a few appeared to understand. The term “Ultramontane” originally meant those who did not acknowledge the authority of the Pope; but by a strange perversion it was now applied to those who were supposed to be anti-British in their policy. However, it enabled British bigots of all classes, wherever they were to be found, to associate themselves in mind with the policy now being adopted in some foreign countries. “Concurrent endowment,” another term used in these discussions, appeared to have a peculiar charm for those who so earnestly desired the repeal of the 25th clause of the English Elementary Education Act. The Irish people, however, could not understand on what religious or Christian plea those unhappy parents whose poverty rendered them unable to pay school fees were not to be allowed to have a conscientious feeling in regard to the education of their children. In conclusion, he urged that they should first inquire into what the Irish people desired, and then he believed it would be admitted that what the Roman Catholics asked for was just, and that by granting it they would promote the prosperity of the Empire and advance the cause of religion and of order. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. HERON, in seconding the Amendment, said, that he believed he was the only Member of that House who had suffered from the tests referred to by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), he having been deprived of the Scholarship which his industry had won because he was a Roman Catholic. That, however, did not prevent his using to the utmost all the advantages of the University of Dublin, where he received a splendid education, and where his intercourse with the Fellows, students, and scholars had been most satisfactory. An honourable rivalry existed, not only in the examination and the lecture room, but extended also to the rowing club, the cricket field, and the athletic games, and he believed it to be of the greatest use that young men of different opinions should, along with their studies or their recreations, learn to know and love one another. It was his candid opinion that there were few men who had been at the great Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin, but would say that their best friendships had been formed in them, their dearest recollections were associated with their University days. He must, however, confess that he felt himself in a difficult position, for he was not desirous for one moment to appear to delay the removal of those tests by which he had himself been a sufferer. But there were other considerations. It gave him great pain to hear quoted what was said in a public sermon in the University Chapel by Dr. M'Ivor; for in his own University experience he felt himself perfectly free, and no attempt was made to tamper with his opinions, although he was aware that there had been for years a most disgraceful system, not yet discontinued, of what was called "turning" Roman Catholic students for Scholarships. If the hon. Member for Brighton passed this Bill, this system of turning for scholarships would terminate, but the feeling of Ireland would not be satisfied with the removal of tests. There were two matters which greatly attracted the attention of the Press and of Parliament as regarded Irish University education. One was the general demand for denominational Colleges united to a National University; and the other was the objections which Roman Catholic Bishops and priests naturally had to entrusting, as this Bill would do, the education of Roman Catholics for the next 30 or 40 years to the Protestant ecclesiastics of the University of Dublin. For instance, the late Archbishop Whately held a distinguished position on the Board of National Education in Ireland; he was looked upon as a most liberal ecclesiastic, and for 25 years it was thought that he would honestly endeavour, in co-operation with Dr. Murray, to carry out the national system, and would do nothing against the Church of Rome; but his conversations with Mr. Nassau Senior, which had been published, told a very different tale. In one of those conversations, Archbishop Whately said, that for 20 years extracts from the New Testament had been read in the majority of the National Schools far more diligently than was usual in ordinary Protestant places of education, and those extracts contained so much that was inconsistent with the spirit of Romanism that it was difficult to suppose anyone well acquainted with them could be a thorough Roman Catholic. And in another place he said—"We are undermining the whole structure of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland." When it was found that for 25 years of his life Archbishop Whately had been acting in this manner, it was no wonder that the Roman Catholics distrusted those who had charge of education in Trinity College. He looked upon the abolition of tests as a very small matter, affecting a very small number of persons; for if tests were removed he calculated that there would not be for the next 80 years five Roman Catholic Fellows of Trinity College, although, no doubt, there would be many Roman Catholic students and scholars. The Bill, however, did nothing but remove tests. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had told the House that £5,000 a-year would fall into the hands of Trinity College. Why, that sum might be appropriated to putting an immediate Roman Catholic representation upon the Board of the College, in order to protect the interests of the Roman Catholic students. The great objection, however, which Roman Catholics had to entering Trinity College was that it was a Protestant institution. In his own case he had heard Mr. Justice Keating declare that the reason why the hon. and learned Member could not obtain the Scholarship he had won was not that there was anything in the tests or in the oath which forbade it, but because Trinity College was a Protestant institution, and those to whom its endowments were committed would be violating their trust if they gave any portion of those endowments to Roman Catholics. In fact, the whole system of Trinity College was anti-Catholic, and would remain so for a considerable time. Having cited the authority of Mr. Chichester Fortescue, in 1872, to show that, as to higher education in Ireland, there was a great want, which was felt by all classes of Roman Catholics, the hon. and learned Member said that, while the endowments of Oxford and Cambridge were originally given by the Catholics of the Middle Ages—the total revenues of Oxford being £174,570, and of Cambridge £145,269, besides 736 livings valued at £132,860 per annum—Trinity College had only about £40,000 per annum, and about £5,000 per annum would come from the recent sale of the advowsons. Why, he asked, should not some portion of the educational endowments of the Middle Ages be given to Roman Catholics, whose ancestors had founded them? He did not put the matter on the ground of any hereditary right, though it was true that most of the endowments at Oxford and Cambridge had been given for masses for the souls of deceased benefactors; but the ground on which he wished to put it was this—if there were Catholic education provided for in Ireland by a great Roman Catholic University, the Roman Catholics not only of the United Kingdom, but of the Empire, would resort to it; and these, it should be remembered, were nearly 10,000,000 subjects of the Queen, and paid something like £20,000,000 annually in taxation. Why, then, should not a large sum be paid for the endowment of a denominational College? The hon. Member for Galway had also said that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition might, at the next General Election, go to the country on the “No Popery” cry. He did not agree in that opinion, because the right hon. Gentleman said, in a speech on the 3rd of April, 1866—

“In the same spirit we have brought forward a proposal to grant a Charter to a Roman Catholic University. That proposal was perfectly consistent with the principle we have laid down, that in Ireland the true and wise policy is to create and not to destroy, and to strengthen Protestant institutions by being just to the Roman Catholics.”

Now, he would ask that House, whether they wished to destroy the Protestant character of Trinity College, as would be done by that Bill; for under it the Provost, or the Regius Professor of Divinity, might be a Mahomedan—he might be of any religion or of none. Yet that institution was founded by Queen Elizabeth for the propagation of Protestantism. The Queen's Colleges it must be admitted had been successful in educating young men for high positions, but they had not been successful in satisfying the people of Ireland; and if in times past Trinity College had understood its mission, it might have been opened to Roman Catholics and Dissenters, and might have been the National University. The hon. Member for Brighton said—“Let the College reform itself.” But it had been found by experience that this process of self-reformation was a very slow one. In 1794 the lower grades of University education were opened to Roman Catholics, but no further steps in the same direction had been taken by Trinity College, with the exception that 10 years ago it established some Scholarships which were open to Roman Catholics. In a speech which Lord Derby delivered at Liverpool he referred to the fact that Parliament had maintained the denominational system, and that it had done so in accordance with influential opinion, and because there were facts which Parliament could not ignore. He therefore desired to know why this Bill was to be forced upon the House. Though he had no doubt that under it some Roman Catholic young men would undergo the great labour required to obtain Scholarships, Studentships, and, in the course of years, some four or five Fellowships; yet this he could say from his knowledge of the great body of Irish Roman Catholics, that they would abstain from sending their children to the University of Dublin. He regretted that; and if he could see any possibility of safeguards for Catholic education, he would wish Roman Catholics and Protestants to be educated together. To force through the House and upon the Roman Catholics of Ireland, a measure with which they were discontented, was a very serious step to take. He regretted that Roman Catholics were still in large numbers excluded by the laws from what ought to be the National University of Ireland, for a National University was one of the noblest institutions of civilization, and they might still see it in Ireland; but it could never exist there, whilst the Catholic religion and the Catholic people were excluded from it by the State.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House fully recognises the importance of an early settlement of the question of Univer-city Education in Ireland, but is of opinion that such legislation could be more satisfactorily entered upon after the House has been put into possession of full information as to the opinions and wishes of the several Academic Bodies existing in Ireland, and of the Irish people generally, especially of the classes practically interested in the question, by means of a Royal Commission, with instructions to take evidence and report before the opening of the next Session of Parliament,"—(Mr. Mitchell Henry),

—instead thereof.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he objected to the Bill as being an indirect and unworthy attempt to force upon the people of Ireland a University system against which they had solemnly protested. He was astonished that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) should persevere with the measure in opposition to the wishes of the majority of the Irish people, for such a course was a direct violation of the principles which ought to govern a member of the Liberal party. The bigotry of former times prescribed a religion for Ireland; it now formulated a University; but the people of Ireland had adhered to their religion, and Parliament had withdrawn from the attempt to supersede it. He believed they would adhere to their resolution on the subject of University education, and that Parliament would in like manner endorse their programme. He could not say whether it was a habit with hon. Members on festive occasions, or at any other periods, to discuss points of belief, but he could say it was not his habit to do so, and that during the many years he had sat there, and during the many pleasant hours he had passed in the society of his hon. Friends, he never had the curiosity to inquire what interpretation in the exercise of their private judgment they thought proper to put upon the Scriptures. But if the course of the hon. Member for Brighton were generally adopted, Irish Members would be reduced to the position of mere delegates. They would cross the Channel to lay the demands of their constituents before a body of Scotch and English gentlemen, who would determine upon them according to the views of their constituents, without regard to the electors of Ireland. In other words, the representation of Ireland would be a sham. Fortunately, however, that had not been the case hitherto, for it was incontestable that in the oligarchical Parliaments which had sat since the Union, measures dealing with the domestic affairs of Ireland had been virtually settled by the Irish Members alone so far as they had sought to do so. Was that state of things to be reversed in the more democratic Parliaments of the present day? No. The hon. Member for Brighton was therefore urging the House to take a most unprecedented step, and if it was taken the most disastrous consequences would ensue. Who had suggested that course to the hon. Member? Certainly it was not the Roman Catholics; for they altogether repudiated the interference of the hon. Gentleman, and regarded it as an offensive meddling and gross outrage against their rights. Did the Episcopalians call in the services of the hon. Member? He (The O'Donoghue) could not believe they did. Then, if the hon. Gentleman were acting on behalf of anyone, he must be acting on behalf of the English and Scotch advocates of the mixed system, through whose instrumentality he hoped to impose that system upon Ireland. He could imagine that a stranger might mistake points on which Irishmen differed. Let it not be supposed, however, that the Irish were indifferent to education; they were anxious their children should excel in literature, science, and art; nor did they deny the capacity of the mixed system to produce the best specimens in every department of learning. The only point of difference between them was the channel through which religious instruction should flow. If the people of the United Kingdom were all of one religion these disputes would never have occurred; but it should not be lost sight of that in the opinion of the Irish people education may become, under certain circumstances, a source of the greatest danger. He held that the channel through which education was to reach their children must be freed from any taint of unbelief. Admitting that faith was a treasure to be preserved, it might be urged that each one should be allowed to have his own opinion and keep it to himself; but the course taken by the hon. Member for Brighton rendered this impossible, because the hon. Member sought to impose on the Roman Catholics a University system which they regarded as incompatible with the preservation of revealed truth. If Parliament then became an abettor of the hon. Gentleman, it could not be exonerated from the charge of being his accomplice in an act of the most wanton tyranny. He (The O'Donoghue) represented an Irish constituency, and what he had to consider was whether the demands of his constituents were just and reasonable, and whether the question was one on which Ireland, notwithstanding her position as part of the United Kingdom, had a right to take independent action. It seemed to him that the demands of his constituents in this instance were perfectly just and reasonable, and that the right of Ireland to take independent action in the matter was also equally clear. He therefore would not believe their prayer was spurned, because the hon. Member for Brighton preferred a mixed system. Was it possible to conceive of anything more utterly at variance with the spirit of the constitution than that Irishmen were no longer to have the management of their own purely domestic concerns? They were told that they must educate their children as Englishmen and Scotchmen thought best, or else subject them to disadvantages from which they could not free themselves. Was he to be told that he was not a Liberal for taking this view? Professor Goldwin Smith, of whose liberality there could be no question, had condemned the Liberal party for its policy on the subject of Irish education, pointing out that, like the Roman Catholics of Canada, the Irish Catholics ought to have, and must have, Colleges and Universities of their own. The Irish people now had free votes, and would certainly use them for the purpose of throwing up around the Church they loved the strong outwork of Catholic education. Englishmen and Scotchmen could not say "the question is as much ours as yours; it is not one which you could expect to decide for yourselves." The question was one which practically concerned Irishmen alone. Englishmen or Scotchmen had no interest at all co-equal with theirs, and had no more right to impose their views upon Ireland than upon Canada, where the existence of the denominational system had not impaired the loyalty of Canadian Catholics, though they were some thousands of miles removed from the Mother Country and close by them was the great Republic with its abundant fascinations. Moreover, this was not solely or even mainly an academic question. The issue to be determined was, not which system would give to Ireland the most intellectual culture, but whether the system of higher education to be established there was that preferred by Englishmen and Scotchmen, who had Colleges and Universities of their own, or that preferred by the immense majority of Irishmen, whose position as regarded University education was declared by the Prime Minister to be so scandalously bad as to constitute a distinct religious grievance. It was a question in which, while England and Scotland practically had no interest, Ireland had a vital interest, for at that moment she was more profoundly agitated than at any period of her history, and the agitation was not confined to politicians, but permeated the whole of society, extending even to those who hitherto had kept aloof from agitation. All felt that the decision of the Imperial Parliament would affect not merely the education, but the loyalty of Ireland. For the first time in Irish history, the electoral body were free to use their privileges as they thought proper; they were making demands which they well knew to be just, and they would not be put off with what Englishmen and Scotchmen thought was justice. They would test what was offered to them by the immutable principles of right and wrong, and would decide for themselves whether it was worth their acceptance. The demands of Ireland could not now be postponed or ignored with the impunity of former times, for while formerly large numbers of Irishmen could not take the part they wished to take in politics without ruin to themselves and their families, now the whole Island was instinct with the consciousness of political power and the determination to take part in politics; and every blow struck at a just cause, such as the cause of Catholic education for Catholic Ireland, vibrated with intense force throughout the whole social fabric. Therefore, in every part of Ireland, and by every class, the policy of the Imperial Parliament on this question was being discussed; and impressions the most unfavourable to the justice of the Imperial Parliament had been created. For obvious reasons, many persons rejoiced at this state of things; and among the 4,500,000 of Catholics, out of a total population of under 5,500,000, no one dared to stand up and justify the Imperial policy. That policy, moreover, had given new arms to the advocates of Home Rule. How, for example, could he go down to Tralee and justify a system which withheld from Irishmen the management of their own schools? What chance had he against a man who, before a patriotic people, recalled the memory of the past, and, pointing to recent events, told the people to be convinced that union with Great Britain meant the abnegation of the most ordinary rights of manhood—a state of subjection and degradation to which none but slaves would reconcile themselves. Was redress impossible? He had too much faith in the innate justice and wisdom of Great Britain to believe that it would not settle this question of Irish University education in accordance with the wishes of a majority of the Irish people, and that there was nothing left for Ireland but to resort to a desperate agitation. If Her Majesty's Government or those entitled to speak on behalf of the people of Great Britain would say that this question should be decided in accordance with the wishes of the Irish people, such a statement would produce an incalculably beneficial effect upon the state of public feeling in Ireland, and while saying that, he would remind them that there never was such an opportunity of establishing the Imperial Parliament in the confidence and loyalty of the people of Ireland. That that opportunity might be availed of he earnestly hoped as one who, although a Catholic and an Irishman, had at heart the glory and prosperity of England, and who was also sincerely anxious for the consolidation of the Empire of the Queen.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS said, that his objection to the Bill was that it did not go far enough. It was no settlement of the question. He thought that the Government might when eating their leek, have eaten the whole of it; and, if they had adopted the Bill No. 2, of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) they would have done all that could be done in reference to this question. In Committee it could have been amended so as to accomplish all that could be accomplished on this question. Something could be done for the reform of the University or College, but the chief thing was to remove the tests. He did not know that a Royal Commission was necessary to effect that, neither could he make out what the object of the hon. Member for Galway's (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) Amendment was, as they surely all knew sufficient about the question to form an opinion upon it. It looked very much as if mere delay was the object. The hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) had complained that the wishes of the Irish people were not understood in this country. He (Mr. Agar-Ellis) thought if his countrymen would drop rhetoric and oratory a determination of this question would be the sooner arrived at. Now, supposing that 80 Home Rule Members were returned to the next Parliament, everyone knew that they would go into the lobby alone if they tried to induce the House to adopt the principle of denominational education, so that those who were most in favour of denominational education would gain nothing by the delay. As the Bill, however, abolished tests, he would vote in support of it, on the ground that half-a-loaf was better than no bread.

DR. BALL said, he should vote for the Bill on the grounds he had stated in 1869, and afterwards in 1870, when the subject then came before the House. Those grounds were, that as far as the Bill went, it appeared to be the necessary corollary of the Disestablishment Act which had been passed as regarded the Irish Church. Now, why did he say that? The University of Dublin and Trinity College were undoubtedly founded by Queen Elizabeth in connection with what was termed in her statute the "Ecclesia," or Church, and her idea of the "Ecclesia" or Church, was that of a State Church. There was, however, no definition in her statute of any particular system of doctrine. There was simply an indication on the face of it that the institution was connected with the Church, but by the 2nd of Elizabeth certain services were pronounced to be the only services to be celebrated in the country, and which all persons in Ireland were obliged to conform to and attend. The legal interpretation, therefore, became this—there being legislation of this particular character, and the institution being founded in connection with the Church, it was plain that the whole policy of the institution in its original foundation was in connection with the State Church. Now, as long as that Church continued to be the State Church there was great reason for saying that Parliament had no right to meddle with the character of the Fellowships which constituted the Governing Body under the original foundation. And, further, there was very high authority for holding that Trinity College, Dublin, could not be opened with any propriety until the Irish Church was disestablished. That authority was Sir James Graham, who in this House as Home Secretary, in 1845, when the Queen's Colleges were founded, distinctly stated, in his speech introducing the measure, that the grant of property to Trinity College, Dublin, had been made for a special object—namely, an object in connection with the Irish Church, and in connection with the education of clergymen for it. The same authority also stated that the Government of which he was a Member would never, as long as that Church existed as a State Church, agree to interfere with the peculiar character of the institution. But all that was altered the very moment a measure was passed declaring that the State had no connection in Ireland with any form of religious belief or worship whatever. The House, moreover, should mark that the endowment of Dublin College did not come from private individuals or private sources, and that there was no resemblance between that endowment and the endowments of the Colleges of Oxford or Cambridge. The property of Trinity College, Dublin, was property granted by the Monarch of the day out of confiscated property; and whenever Parliament passed a Bill disestablishing the Irish Church, not only did it declare that the State had no connection with any form of religious worship, but the Bill also virtually adopted another principle—that the Royal Grants made for purposes such as that for which the endowment of Trinity College had been granted were capable of being dealt with by that House precisely on the same grounds and principles as Parliamentary Grants. Now, in his judgment, the question of University education in Ireland might have arisen if Parliament never had disestablished the Irish Church, and he believed that it had actually arisen, for whether they were to have one University for the whole Island, or several Universities, was a question as capable of having and demanding consideration the day before the Irish Church Act was passed as the day after. Whether they were to have the one or the other, and on what footing the one University or each separate University was to be constructed, were equally questions then as now; but they were all involved in the logical consequences flowing from the Irish Church Act. Although he voted for the Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton in 1870, he at the time thought it did not form the be-all and the end-all of the question, for an instantaneous claim arose, which required to be considered in every academic aspect—that for the Disestablished Church of Ireland provision should be made of an independent character, to aid and assist in the education of its students of Divinity. He would admit that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had very fairly acknowledged that claim in the measure he had introduced, though the provision he had made to meet it was wholly and utterly inadequate. He wished to state why he considered that the Disestablished Church of Ireland had a claim which would not be satisfied by a Bill of this character, and the reason he would assign was, that the matter arose out of the mode in which they had dealt with the College of Maynooth. Notwithstanding all the debate that had taken place there was still no full and complete knowledge upon that matter. What was Maynooth? It was not a College for the Roman Catholic Body generally, but it was an institution for the education of the Roman Catholic priesthood alone. Originally it was intended that it should be an institution for the Roman Catholic Body generally, and Mr. Burke was the person who first pointed out that that could not be in accordance with the Roman Catholic system. That he did in A Letter to a Noble Lord in Ireland, who there was reason to believe was a Member of the Government of the day. In that letter Mr. Burke said that from the nature of the Roman Catholic priesthood members of that Body could not be educated with laymen. First, he said that the nature of the office was such that persons intended for it must from an early period be trained apart, and under such circumstances that no external influence could impair their view of the office which they would undertake. Secondly, he said, that from the institution of the celibacy of the clergy, it was necessary that the priesthood should be trained up in such a way that doctrines and opinions inconsistent with that view should not be suffered to disturb the belief which they were to be educated to administer and adopt. Further, by the Council of Trent it was provided that, after such persons had been in seminaries they should receive in a special institution instruction in those particular doctrines and parts of the system. The consequence of all this was, that Maynooth was an institution founded for priests only. Now, what was the position when they came to the Irish Church Act? Maynooth had no claim upon the funds of the Disestablished Church; but, it being an establishment for the education of priests only, they gave it from those funds £400,000, which was indeed called compensation for life interests, but which would be used for the purpose of educating the priesthood. Now what he said was this—that for exclusively religious purposes the Disestablished Church of Ireland had a claim for assistance for itself out of the very same source, the Surplus Fund. The present measure, therefore, would be a wholly inadequate one, unless in some other measure it was provided that there should be provisions for dealing with this matter. Again, in dealing with the claims of the Irish Presbyterians at the time of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, a sum of money derived from the funds of that Church was also handed to them to be applied to the maintenance of institutions for the education of their clergy. Could there, therefore, be a fairer demand than that which he now put forward on behalf of the Disestablished Church, that they should be left the means of educating their priesthood? He did not, however, now bring forward the matter in order to embarrass the present question, but to show that it could not be said that the present was a whole and perfect measure, it being, in fact, but a part of two Bills, formerly introduced by the hon. Member (Mr. Fawcett), and not at all extending to the whole range of the question. That was plain, because it extended only to one single institution, Dublin College and University, and it did not profess to deal with all Ireland. He would merely add that he thought there was too much said about a National University. He did not think it so imperative a part of any scheme of University reform that there need be an essentially National University. There were Englishmen in Trinity College when he was there; and did any one pretend that Oxford, Cambridge, Durham, or London could be called National Universities? When was it thought necessary to lay down this, that a University should be co-extensive with the nation? For his part he much doubted the wisdom of trying to make out that a University should have that character stamped upon it, so that the people of one part of the realm should be led to imagine that they were wholly separate from those who resided in another part of the realm. Why should not students be received into the University from any place, as there were Scotch and Irish gentlemen at both Oxford and Cambridge; and the number of such students was increasing? He was not prepared, therefore, to adopt as a necessity a single institution with some local name, giving an idea of exclusive nationality; because he hoped that Ireland would always be considered as part of Great Britain as much as Devonshire and Cornwall were.

MR. PIM said, he would support the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), if it were brought forward as an independent Motion, but he could not support it in opposition to the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). He had himself, in the year 1868, suggested the issuing of a similar Commission to Lord Mayo, who was then the chief Secretary for Ireland, and he had often regretted that this mode of inquiry had not been adopted, for he felt confident that if this question had been fully investigated before the Government measure on the subject was introduced, the Prime Minister would have had a fuller insight into the feeling of Ireland upon it than he had when he brought forward that measure, and it might have saved him from the difficulty in which he had been placed by his own Bill. He could not, however, vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway, because in doing so he would oppose a Bill which he thought ought to be passed. This

Bill was a step in the right direction. It would relieve the Irish Protestants who were not members of the Episcopal Church from the disabilities under which they at present laboured; but it in no way touched the grievances of the Irish Roman Catholics—on the contrary, it would bring them more prominently into view when the Protestant grievance was redressed. The demand of the Roman Catholics for University education of their own was as just now as their demand for emancipation had been 40 years ago, and it would not only be an act of gross injustice, but of most mistaken policy to refuse it, or to regard this measure as an adequate answer to it. There were two points in the Bill on which he felt very strongly. The first was with respect to the present Divinity School of the Disestablished Church, to turn out which he thought would be a great injustice. On that subject he had given Notice of Amendments which he intended to move when the Bill was in Committee. The other point was the right which the Crown now possessed of appointing the Provost—a right which he considered to be of a doubtful character under all circumstances, and the evil of which would be greatly increased when the University was thrown open to persons of all religious creeds. If Trinity College was maintained as the great educational establishment for Ireland, and if the Roman Catholics did not obtain a University or College of their own, they would, of course, put forward their claims to the appointment of Provost; he had no doubt they would be successful, and probably on the next vacancy. Now, he would ask any Irish Member who heard him, to consider what would be the effect of the appointment by the Government of a Roman Catholic to be Provost? He had himself no doubt that it would lessen the Protestant students by one-half. All the objections which had been urged in a former debate against the nomination of members of the Council by Government would apply with equal force to the Government appointment of a Provost. The election ought to be vested in the College itself, and then, while ever the majority of the students remained Protestant, a Protestant would no doubt be chosen for this office. He strongly desired that Trinity College should remain a Protestant institution, and that the Roman Catholics should have an institution of equal position for themselves; and it was only some such measure that could preserve Trinity College as a Protestant institution. But if a Roman Catholic College was established he believed that Trinity College would remain essentially Protestant for very many years, although open to all persons without distinction and without the imposition of any test. He hoped there would be no division against the Bill, but if there was he should feel obliged to walk out of the House. He could not vote against the appointment of a Commission which he so much desired to have appointed, and he would not do anything to impede the passing of the Bill.

Mr. SYNAN said, he was surprised at the extraordinary reason which had been given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) for supporting the Bill, that he looked on it as a corollary to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and would ask him how it followed from the passing of that measure that the Protestant Episcopalians of Ireland should not have a denominational College for the education of their children? How also, he should like to know, could the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he voted for the Bill, refuse to support the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) when he brought in his Bill No. 4 to complete his scheme, and proposed to take away the endowments of Trinity College and give them to the Irish people at large? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman voted for the present Bill, he must, to be consistent, vote for such a proposal as that, and the endowments of Trinity College must go. For his own part, he approved of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry); as a substantive Motion, and if he were a Protestant denominationalist, he would raise his voice and second his vote against the measure before the House, but as an Irish Roman Catholic he had no interest in taking that course, and he therefore would confine himself to protest against the attempt to coerce his opinions and those of his co-religionists which Englishmen and Scotchmen dared to make. If Irish Protestants insisted upon turning their denominational College into a secular one, he had no right to oppose them. He ventured to tell his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, whose good intentions he valued, but whose wrong judgment he did not regard, that there was no difference in Ireland among the Catholics on the subject of education, and that the Irish Catholic Members, though he had succeeded in defeating a Government, would be a power in the House equal to himself, and that upon a question not Imperial, in which the feelings of the people of Ireland were deeply concerned, they claimed to be the best judges of that which was most calculated to promote their interests. He would further observe that when, a short time ago, hon. Gentlemen opposite wished to carry the denominational clauses in the English Education Bill, they would have been shamefully beaten had not the Irish Roman Catholic Members gone into the lobby with them. And what was the return? Those same hon. Gentlemen now threw themselves into the arms of the hon. Member for Brighton. Was that their reward for defeating the University education scheme of the Government?—a scheme, he would say, originally framed in no party view, and brought forward with the very best intentions; but how was it mutilated in its progress? After the attack of the hon. Member for Brighton and his Friends, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had put up the Secretary of State for War to destroy his own Bill, and the Secularists were told they might do what they liked with the Bill in Committee. Up to a certain point he believed the Bill would have been made better, or, at least not made worse; but it afterwards became clear that it was intended to change it to suit the views of the Secularists, and when Irish Members saw that, it was impossible they could support it. They divided against it; and that was their justification for the vote they had given. Finally, he could not regard this Bill as even a step towards the settlement of the Irish Education question; and, while as a Roman Catholic, he was entirely hostile to tests, he should nevertheless withdraw from the division, and he hoped every other hon. Member who felt as he did would vindicate their position by adopting a similar course and thereby protesting against the Bill and against the sanction which the Government had given it by aiding the hon. Member for Brighton to pass such a measure.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, that while concurring in a great degree with what had been said by his hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. Synan), he could not, as a Roman Catholic and a Liberal Member, vote against the second reading of this Bill in its present shape as a Bill for the removal of tests. During the whole of his public life his great effort had been to get rid of tests; how, then, could he vote against their removal? While admitting the difficulty—almost amounting to an impossibility—Irish Roman Catholic Members would experience in voting for the Bill, he thought, however, they would find quite as great a difficulty in voting against a measure which abolished those tests which had hitherto excluded men of the highest character and attainments from those honours and emoluments to which they were fairly entitled because they were Roman Catholics. It had been said that a man's opinions were seldom changed by speeches made in that House, but he confessed he had some difficulty in making up his mind as to the course he should take till he heard the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for Dublin University (Dr. Ball). With all deference, he must say he did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed the opinion of the Protestant people of Ireland, the Disestablished Church of Ireland, or the Synod which had recently been held in Dublin. Having read the statement made by some of the leading members of that Synod, he thought it might be his duty to vote against the Bill, but after the declaration made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he, as representing the Protestant party in the University, was content with this Bill and disposed to accept it, his doubts had been removed. Two of the most eminent men who took part in the proceedings of the Synod declared—and a resolution was unanimously adopted to the effect—that the Bill, if passed into law, would sweep away all religious tests even from the Divinity Professorship, and that a Turk, a Mahomedan, a Buddhist, or a person professing no religion whatever, might become Professor of Divinity in Trinity College. That appeared to be the opinion of the unsophisticated Episcopalian Protestants of Ireland. He, therefore, felt a difficulty in not voting against the Bill; for although he had assisted in dis-establishing the Irish Church, he did not wish to take a step that would prevent any guardianship being provided for the education of those who were to become the future teachers of the people, and hand over the education of the rising generation to licentious and profligate men, and even to blasphemers of religion itself. But, he must repeat, that his difficulty had been removed by the declaration of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. At the same time, however, he solemnly protested against the Bill under whatever guise it was put forward, for in what respects did this Bill differ from all former attempts to settle the Education question in Ireland? In no respect whatever. The Education difficulty had existed in Ireland for 250 years; and various attempts had been made to settle it, at one time by coercion and force, at another by confiscation and the sword. As time progressed, coercion was given up and attempts were made to seduce the Catholics from their ancient faith. Within their own days the Kildare Place Society had attempted by honeyed words, and even by bread and butter, to seduce children from the doctrines their parents taught them. And that Bill proceeded on the very same principle of the Kildare Place Society; it offered to remove all obstacles to the Irish people accepting a mixed system which they had been taught not to accept. Now that was an attempt to seduce them into contumacy against their religious superiors; and that very attempt made it more difficult to propose a change which would be satisfactory to the Irish people. They had given to the people of India Mahomedan Colleges rather than do violence to their feelings, and in Canada there were a College and a University where the Catholics had visitatorial powers, and the result was the people were contented. By the same reason, if they desired content in Ireland, they must do for it what they had done for India and Canada. Unfortunately, however, bigotry and intolerance had been fanned by speeches made in that House and elsewhere, and he blamed those who had stimulated prejudices for the present difficulty.

The Disestablished Church Commission, would have a balance of £5,000,000 or £8,000,000, and, in order to avoid the frank and manly course of giving that to the Catholics to establish a University, and so compensating them for that of which they had been unjustly deprived, they were driven to saying that religion should be ignored.

MR. PLUNKET said, that he had spoken so often upon this subject when the prospects of the measure seemed far less prosperous that he should not have asked the House for any further indulgence, but for some misapprehensions which might have been created by words that had fallen from one of the preceding speakers. He wished at the same time to join in the appeal which had been made to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) not to press his Amendment to a division. It had been suggested by the hon. Member for Galway that the opinions of the Junior Fellows of Trinity College were not correctly stated by those who were supposed to represent them in this House. He did not deny that among those Junior Fellows there were some who differed in opinion from the remainder on this subject. He admitted that there were four of the Junior Fellows of Trinity College—and they were very able men, whose opinions were entitled to great respect, who, he believed, did not agree with the rest in reference to this Bill; but it was only fair to add that those four Junior Fellows were four out of 25, and that all the others last year signed a resolution in favour of this Bill, while this year representatives of the Junior Fellows were taken into consultation by the Governing Body of the College, and they agreed with the Seniors that it was right to press this measure forward. The grounds on which he would appeal to the hon. Member for Galway not to press his Amendment were these—the hon. Member himself had hardly denied that by a great many Protestants, whether Episcopalian or Presbyterian, the abolition of tests in Trinity College and in the University would be regarded as a great and immediate advantage. He (Mr. Plunket) well knew that to one individual in particular it was almost a matter of life and death. There was a student of Trinity College who last year as the result of a very severe examination, won the right to a Fellowship. He was a man of high intellectual attainments, who had studied hard, and competed for it in the hope that when the time came for his election the tests which stood in his way would have been removed. However, that had not happened, and he was prevented by religious scruples from taking the tests. Would it not be hard if this student, who, there was reason to believe, might again this year win a Fellowship if his health held out through the ordeal, was again cut off from the reward of his labours by these tests? He would therefore appeal to the hon. Member for Galway not to press his Amendment, for the reason that to this Gentleman and to a great number of his fellow Protestants, in whose interest the hon. Member professed to act, this Bill would prove a boon, which they were not only willing, but anxious to accept. Further, he knew that by a great number of Roman Catholics this measure would be received with welcome. But if there were some Roman Catholics who did not choose to take advantage of the opportunities that would be thus afforded to them by the University of Dublin—if they still desired denominational Colleges or a University exclusively for themselves, in the name of reason, he would ask them why should they object to the adoption of the present Bill on that account? What was there in the passing of that measure to prevent the hon. Member for Galway or any other hon. Member from framing such a plan as they thought the House was likely to adopt? He (Mr. Plunket) confessed he could not hold out a prospect of immediate success as an encouragement to them to take this course; but how, he asked, could they justify themselves in their refusal to allow a measure so acceptable to many persons of all creeds to pass, on the ground that it failed to give them that complete University reform which they for themselves desired? That was not a final Bill; it certainly was not so as regarded the Divinity School of Trinity College, Dublin, and on this point he concurred in what had fallen from his right hon. Colleague. The hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), when referring to the resolutions recently adopted by the Synod of the Disestablished Church, did not mention that the Synod knew that this Bill was likely to be passed. What their resolutions affirmed was that, standing alone, unaccompanied, and not followed by other legislation, it would not be a satisfactory solution of the whole question. That was no new idea. Two years ago, when this Bill was first introduced, he (Mr. Plunket) stated distinctly, that as regarded the Divinity School, it was not final, that questions would arise hereafter which must be dealt with, and the reason why no attempt was made to deal with them in the Bill was, that there were hopes that the new Governing Body of the University which it was desired to organize would be better able to dispose of them. It was, moreover, quite true that if the Divinity School were to remain long as it would be left by this Bill, circumstances might arise that would reduce it to a condition which any Protestant would regret to see. They of Trinity College, then, regarded this as but a temporary measure; but they felt also that they could not of themselves alone remedy the defect, because at the time the first Bill was brought in the Disestablished Church had hardly organized itself; and, indeed, it could not be said to have even yet fully recovered from the shock of disestablishment and disendowment. It was obvious that when a further proposal was made as to the Protestant Divinity School, an understanding would have to be arrived at between the persons who were in future to carry on its government, and those who now had control over it. Further than that, the Bill was not final in another way—namely, in respect to the Government of Trinity College and Dublin University. Of the two plans referred to by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), the first had proposed the establishment of a new Constitution, the second had suggested merely a consulting Council which should draw up statutes, so as to bring the University and Trinity College more into conformity with altered circumstances. It was plain therefore that the necessity for further changes had from the first been duly recognized, though they had been obliged to forego their accomplishment for the present. But the House might rest assured, that as Trinity College had lately had a very narrow escape, no time would be lost, by them in setting their house in order, so that they might in future be safe from the attacks of other reformers, far less in accordance with their tastes and interests than the hon. Member for Brighton, who had so gallantly and honourably stood by them through their recent difficulties and dangers. He wished emphatically to repudiate the title that had been given so absurdly to that hon. Member of an "officious meddler." What the hon. Gentleman had done he had done with the full consent of the Governing Body of the University of Dublin; and up to that moment there was no reason whatever for saying that they had altered their views on the subject. The proposal contained in the Bill was certainly intended as an honest, open-handed concession, as an advantage to be offered to certain persons at present labouring under serious penalties; and it was very undesirable that at the last moment it should be opposed in a spirit, he would not say of factiousness, but at all events of delay, and that too by an hon. Member claiming to represent a population for whose benefit the measure was designed. He would, therefore join in the appeal made to the hon. Member for Galway not to press his Amendment.

Mr. BUTT did not think that the taking of a vote would delay the Bill, and he therefore hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) would give him and others an opportunity of recording their vote on the subject, considering the state of the House and the little interest apparently taken by hon. Members in it. Almost all the speeches that had been delivered had convinced him of the prudence and wisdom of the Resolution, for it was impossible for that House to ascertain the real state of the people of Ireland on the subject without further inquiry. For instance, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down told the House that the Junior Fellows of Trinity College were in favour of the Bill, other hon. Members said they were not; and how was the House to know the fact, if not by the inquiry proposed by his hon. Friend? The fact was, that the Fellows of Trinity College accepted the Bill to escape a greater evil, and he believed if an opportunity were now given of ascertaining their opinions, the majority would say that they adopted the Bill as a matter of necessity, not thinking it was the best thing to be done. The Amendment rested upon two simple propositions—that there ought not to be legislation without accurate information as to the feelings and wishes of all classes of the Irish people, and that such information they did not now possess. The Bill would not give to the Roman Catholics the University institutions they desired, and he was satisfied that nothing less would be regarded as a satisfactory settlement of the question; indeed, he believed a very great change had taken place recently in Protestant opinion upon this subject. He had taken pains to ascertain the opinions of intelligent Protestants in different parts of Ireland, and he believed that nine out of ten would be in favour of settling it, if it were to be settled, by giving endowments to the Roman Catholics, and preserving those of the Protestants. Was it of importance that they should know whether that was true or not? Were they to legislate upon the uninformed prejudices of the House, or upon an enlightened acquaintance with the wishes and feelings of the Irish people? It was said that other measures were to follow that; was not that a reason for delaying this until the complete scheme was before them? Why should they take a leap in the dark? It was true that in the case of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge they abolished tests, they excepted the Professors of Divinity, but there was no such exception in this Bill. The English Bill further excepted the Heads of Colleges, who were required to be in Holy Orders, and excluded the Head of every College in Oxford, except one. It had, however, been pointed out that under the Bill as it stood a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic might be appointed Provost of Trinity College. Insert the words of the English Bill, and that could not be. But if a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic were placed at the head of Trinity College, would the Protestants of Ireland continue to send their sons there? The Bill, therefore, would put it in the power of a Ministry to destroy Trinity College by appointing a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, or even a Roman Catholic layman to become its Head. What change was it proposed to effect ultimately in Trinity College? The Preamble of the Bill declared it was to be retained as a place of religion, as well as learning; but what religion was it to be—was it to be that of the large majority of the nation?

They were Roman Catholic, and how were the benefits of religion to be thrown open to them? The statutes of Trinity College were essentially Protestant in their character; they were left untouched by the Bill, and Roman Catholics were to be admitted to administer them. The English Bill, as he had said, exempted virtually all the Heads of Houses in both Universities, and declared that nothing should interfere with their religious character, discipline, and worship. Was it intended the same should be done in that case? Was the College to continue to be a place of religious education essentially Protestant, or was it not? It was said that if you destroyed the essentially Protestant character of the College you would destroy it. The University, moreover, was a University for the Protestant people of Ireland; it had not too large revenues, nor was it too great for them, therefore he wished to maintain it for those for whom it was desired, and as a means to that end he desired to give the Catholics their own University. Then, if either Protestants or Catholics wished to abolish tests, let them do so; but let those changes be the growth of opinion, and not forced upon them. Repudiated by Catholics, the Bill could not be a settlement, and it would create hostility which did not now exist, because, if the Fellowships were thrown open, the College would become the theatre of a contention between the Roman Catholic Church, the Government, and the people, which would not be calculated to increase its stability or insure its safety. He objected to the Bill for the sake of the effect it would have on the University itself, for no exception was made, not even as to the teaching of Divinity. Why, there was nothing in the Bill to prevent a Mahomedan from being elected Professor of Divinity in the University of Dublin, if he were the one person best acquainted with the history and doctrines of the various Christian sects; indeed, in the latter view of the case, they would have no other course open to them under the terms of the statute. Before assenting to a change in a University, which had worked well for the Protestants of Ireland, and which had proved itself to be the most liberal Protestant institution in Europe, he should like to know exactly the meaning and end of the change proposed, and also what were the feelings of the Irish people on the subject? He was aware of the manner in which Ministers were supposed to learn something of the sentiments of the Irish people. There were informers who could go up the back-stairs of the Castle, and make statements to the Lord Lieutenant—and if he could suppose it, others who went up the back-stairs of Downing Street, and represented to the Government that the Irish Members did not in any sense represent the feeling of their country upon the question; but his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) wished to have information to be conveyed to the House and to the Ministers in the light of day, and to be reported by a Royal Commission. In order to test the truth of such information, he asked the House to support the Amendment from a belief that the result would prove the contrary. Further, might he ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government whether he had not had enough that Session of the other species of information? Did not the right hon. Gentleman anticipate that the Irish University Bill would be accepted in a very different spirit by many classes in Ireland? If accurate information were required then, let a Royal Commission be issued, before which the Roman Catholic laity would have an opportunity of stating their opinions; and here he might remark that he knew of no educational institution where so much real liberality existed among the students as in the Catholic University, which was sometimes described as being under the influence of the Ultramontane hierarchy. If it should be ascertained by a Royal Commission that the feeling of Irish Protestants was in favour of the endowment of a Roman Catholic University, he felt sure this House would not oppose a settlement which the immense majority of the Irish nation approved. He must therefore press his hon. Friend to divide, because he wished to record his vote against a Bill, no matter by whom it was supported, which he believed would be fatal to the existence, in a few years, of the University of Dublin.

Mr. GLADSTONE: If the Question, that this Bill be read a second time, had been put immediately after the introductory statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), I should have been perfectly contented to support it with a silent vote; for the Government have already indicated their opinion of the measure by the disposition they have shown to allow my hon. Friend such facilities as the other demands of Public Business will permit them to offer him for bringing forward his Bill; and we still feel a disposition to give him those facilities, with respect to which, however, I must say that we hope he will also use his own best exertions, because we who are ill able to provide opportunities for our own Bills, may not be able to do for him all we could wish. But the scope of the discussion has been widened by the Amendment which has been proposed, and likewise by the speeches which have been made in the course of the debate. We are asked to adopt a Resolution in favour of the appointment of a Royal Commission which is to be issued by the Crown—I suppose upon the prayer of this House—for the purpose not of examining and considering the question of Irish University education, not for the purpose of ascertaining matters of fact connected with it, but for the purpose of ascertaining the opinions and wishes of the several academic bodies existing in Ireland, and of the people generally on this subject. I cannot help observing that this Motion, as far as I know, has at least the merit of being an absolute novelty among the many varieties of Parliamentary propositions, for I do not remember that upon any occasion it has ever been the practice of this House, or that it has even been proposed to this House, to employ the machinery of a Royal Commission for the purpose of ascertaining the opinions and wishes of the people. We have to employ Royal Commissioners—often with great utility—when there are difficult and complicated matters of fact to be examined which require and admit of a precise scrutiny—matters of fact which this House may not be able to undertake thoroughly to search out; but with regard to the collection of the opinions and wishes of the people, this is a most extraordinary delegation of the first and most elementary duty of Parliament itself to an instrument that is to be chosen by the Crown at the pleasure or on the advice of the Government of the day; and were it only on that ground I, for one could not possibly vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). I must also remark that there is latent in this Motion an assumption which I am not ready to grant with reference to any one of the three countries, and that is, that the opinion which may prevail in a particular country—whether it be England, Scotland, or Ireland, and I can draw no distinction, all being on the same footing of absolute equality—is finally and absolutely to rule the judgment of Parliament with regard to particular subject-matters. Both on that ground and the other to which I have referred, it is impossible for me to vote for the Amendment. Then are we to vote for the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton or are we not? If you listened to several of the speeches which have been made, the scope of this debate might be estimated to be a very wide one indeed; but look at the Bill as it comes before us—and I speak of the Bill generally, and not with reference to the particular point noticed by the hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), and the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down (Mr. Butt)—namely, that for the removal of tests. In Trinity College and the University of Dublin, at the present moment, we have a state of things in which the education of the University, the examinations of the University, the honours of the University, and, I believe, some very small fraction of the rewards of the University are open to all without regard to religious distinctions. But my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton asks us to go further, and to enact, in general conformity with the principle on which we have already proceeded for England, that not only the studies, the examinations, and the honours of the University, but the emoluments of the University generally and the Governing Body should be thrown open irrespective of religious distinctions. That which we have done in England, where an Established Church prevails, and that which, substantially, we have done in Scotland, where an Established Church also still exists, it would certainly be singular to refuse to do in Ireland, where no Established Church exists, but where the Established Church has been deliberately abolished by the judgment of Parliament. Consequently the present measure appears to be a simple one, and one which is sustained both by general considerations applicable to a question of this class, and by the precedents which we ourselves have set in England and in Scotland not only in parallel circumstances, but in circumstances where an argument of this nature was much weaker indeed than it is in the case of a country situated as Ireland now is. What, then, are the arguments which have been urged against the Bill? I confess that I have some difficulty in collecting them from most of the speeches made by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. As far, however, as I am able to do so, they come very much to this. If I am to put a general construction upon the speech of my hon. Friend (The O'Donoghue), it comes to this point—that he wishes to have established in Ireland a system of denominational grants to Colleges and Universities for the different religious communions which make up among them the Irish people, and that, as the present measure proceeds upon a different basis—opening a particular College in a University instead of keeping it close—he will vote against the second reading. I cannot deny the perfect sufficiency of such an allegation from a Gentleman who regards the subject from that point of view, nor do I intend to enter upon the general argument of the justice or injustice of that point of view. We have had other opportunities of dealing with it, and I will only now notice one expression of my hon. Friend, in order to say that under no circumstances can I be bound by it. He says the question whether higher education in Ireland shall be supported by a system of denominational grants is a question of purely domestic concern for the people of Ireland. I am not able to subscribe to that proposition. Subjects of this kind—subjects of religion and education—have never been treated in any of the three countries as matters of purely domestic concern to each one of them separately. They have always been regarded as Imperial questions. For instance, when my hon. Friend gave us his support on the disestablishment of the Irish Church, that was not treated as a domestic question of purely Irish concern. It was treated upon Imperial considerations, though those considerations were governed in their application by the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. It was not, however, treated as a matter of Irish concern, but as a matter with regard to which, had the same circumstances existed in England, Parliament would have been prepared to take the same course. Moreover, I think my hon. Friend himself would find some difficulty in adhering, after a closer examination of the case, to the doctrine that this important question is one of purely Irish concern. Suppose my hon. Friend himself proposed to appropriate a larger sum of public money, whether from the Consolidated Fund or from any special Irish fund, for the purpose of supporting a Roman Catholic College in Ireland. If he were to give the public money in that way, he must give it to a College with a certain constitution; by that constitution the exercise of powers within the College would be determined, and consequently the State in granting the money, must become parties to the constitution under which the grant would be administered. How are these powers to be divided between the laity and the clergy in the Roman Catholic Church? And are they to be severally represented in the government and control of the College? These are questions of the utmost importance and difficulty, and how would it be possible for us to make such grants and lay down certain principles with regard to the sort of constitution—Episcopal, clerical, or lay—which we should recognize in Ireland; and at the same time have different principles on which to treat analogous questions in England? The question of the Roman Catholic Church, its constitution and government, is not confined to Ireland, and, if it were, the analogy drawn from our proceedings in such a case would be quoted to influence our conduct in England and Scotland. Both from the reason of the case and from a long-continued course of precedents, therefore, it is plainly impossible to treat this question as a matter of purely local concern for any one of the three kingdoms; for if it were possible, it would undoubtedly be rather a strange course that we, after having in the matter of religion, where anything secular is involved, determined that the State would not connect itself with any one religious communion in Ireland, should, two or three years afterwards, hand over the intellectual training of the country in its highest departments to the management of religious bodies and to Episcopal or ecclesiastical control. I do not go farther into these important subjects, but my

hon. Friend will see the difficulties which must present themselves to persons responsible for the conduct of affairs before they can accede to the proposition he lays down that a subject of this kind is to be treated as one of merely local concern. As was said by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball), the main and the best founded objection to this measure is its limited character. But that objection can hardly hold good unless it can be shown that the limited concession which is proposed is itself open to just objection. If this measure in Ireland be legitimate and beneficial, the fact that it touches one department of this question only, and does not deal with the whole, can never be deemed a reason for its rejection. I am one of those who fully admit that it is a limited measure, and that the question of academic reform—which is entirely separate from the imposition of tests—cannot be supposed to be finally settled, or, indeed, to have made any serious progress towards settlement, by the simple passing of a measure such as that now before us. My own opinion is, not that, upon general abstract grounds, it is necessary to have one National University, and only one in the country—my opinion is, that if we are to act upon principles of religious equality in their application to Ireland, those principles do demand, as has been set out in the Preamble of this Bill, that the entire people of Ireland shall have free access to the University of Dublin; and I own for my own part—and I go a step further and say—that so far as I can see, it is impossible for them to have free access if they are to be confined to that mode of passage and teaching into the University of Dublin which Trinity College offers. There is no doubt that Trinity College is a College of Protestant tradition and Protestant aspects, and Trinity College must long so continue. It has to choose its Fellows not merely on abstract grounds of excellent scholarship, but with regard to its teaching functions, which, very much to the honour of that institution, every Junior Fellow is called upon to perform. I feel, therefore, that it is a great boon both to Protestant Dissenters, and Roman Catholics to remove the barriers which now obstruct access to the endowments of Trinity College, but at the same time, in my opinion, it would be little less than mockery were we to treat this measure as in itself acquitting us of our debt in reference to giving to the people of Ireland the full advantages of National University education. I have another word to say upon the reference made by the two hon. and learned Members for the University of Dublin to the Divinity School there. It is not necessary on this occasion to enter into the subject in detail, for in the Bill introduced by the Government we indicated distinctly the principle on which we thought it would be equitable to deal with it. But, after listening to the speeches of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball) and his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket), I feel some difficulty regarding this portion of the measure. When I heard the senior Member for the University the atmosphere seemed misty, but after listening to the junior Member I was in black darkness as to the nature and scope of the Bill. If I rightly gathered the statement of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Plunket), he said in effect this—"We are going by the present Bill to throw open, irrespective of religious belief, the Theological Faculty in the University of Dublin; but we only do this as a temporary measure, and there must be some other measure which I do not now describe, and am not prepared to lay before the House, which will undo the present Bill and close again the Theological Faculty we are now about to throw open." I must say the hon. and learned Gentleman by that statement gave a considerable advantage to my hon. learned and able Friend behind me (Mr. Butt), of which he was not slow to avail himself, protesting with much justice against being asked to vote for a Bill some portion of which we are to pass now, in order that we may review it and limit its operation by some other measure to be introduced hereafter under circumstances which at present are neither explained nor understood. I do not proceed upon any such principle; I simply support the measure as one for the removal of tests in the University of Dublin. So far as the Theological Faculty is concerned our plan has been before the House, and I must not assume that it met with favour; but we are now out of the way, and our business is to give place to others who, we hope, may be more fortunate than ourselves. I should like, however, to know what is thought of the Bill in the interests of religion and in the interests of the Disestablished Church by the Governing Body of Trinity College, by the Senate of the University, which on a recent occasion became so eloquent, though it had not previously loosed the string of its tongue, and what counsel is offered by the two hon. and learned Members for the University? At present, on this subject, I am entirely in the dark. I wait there, contentedly; but I have endeavoured to point out that the scope of this Bill is really a very limited scope, and that it confers, as has been very well said by the hon. and learned Gentleman the junior Member for the University of Dublin, a great practical benefit upon both Protestant Dissenters and many Roman Catholics in Ireland, by the removal of obstructions which now exist. That benefit it confers with perfect willingness—nay, with readiness and eagerness on the part of the Protestant Episcopalians to offer a boon, and under these circumstances it would be a most extraordinary course to be taken by the House of Commons, were we to be the parties to interfere and prevent the realization of those very considerable advantages which the Bill undoubtedly secures—which are on the one hand so readily tendered, and on the other so much desired.

Mr. MUNSTER said, he found it difficult to gather from the debate which had occurred whether the Bill was to stand alone, or to be followed by other measures dealing with the subject of University education in Ireland. He inclined, however to the opinion that other measures were in contemplation, and he opposed the first step towards the establishment of a system in Ireland similar to that of the London University, for what were the practical results of that institution? There was nothing granted by the Bill which the Roman Catholics of Ireland would accept. In England opinion was divided on the subject of religious and purely secular education; in Ireland, on the other hand, Protestants and Roman Catholics were agreed on this point—that religion should be the basis of education. That being so, the Roman Catholics would only consent to commit the education of their children and the training of their young men to teachers in whom they and their priests had confidence. They would not submit to the religious teaching of Trinity College, and they believed that a University which professed to teach no religion was either a farce or a mockery.

Mr. REDMOND, in supporting the Amendment, said, that though the settlement of the question now before the House was a matter of necessity, no serious effort had been made to deal with it effectually. The Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) did not profess to deal with that burning question of the day, University education, but was designated to uphold that secular system which the people of Ireland would never accept. It might appear strange that after this question had been discussed for years it should now be necessary to invite the House to obtain information as to the feelings, and wishes, and wants of the people of Ireland; but the late debate had demonstrated that the House did not yet realize the extent, and the constancy, and the earnestness of the people of Ireland in regard to the education of the Roman Catholic population of that country. The Government had acknowledged that an educational grievance existed, and that it was their duty to remedy that grievance, and were ready to stake their existence on carrying out these views. Were they going to give up that object? If the House rejected the Amendment of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) what did they propose to do? What did the Government intend to do? Would they ignore the claims of the people of Ireland upon this subject? The Government had stated over and over again that the subject ought to be dealt with, and he believed that if the House had accepted the Amendment it would have had a very happy effect upon the people of Ireland; but if it were rejected what would the effect be? Why, that they persisted in legislating for Ireland upon the basis of opinions in England and Scotland. It would be thought in Ireland that England was so strong that she braved the opinions of the people of Ireland; but he would say that if she were ten times as strong and as wealthy she could not do that with safety to the position. The Bill did not propose to deal with the question of education generally, and the Roman Catholics looked at what it proposed to do with distrust. They could not feel grati-sed in seeing the old University start upon a secular career. They did not wish to see Trinity College drawn down to the level of the "godless" Colleges, for Trinity College had been regarded with more good feeling than had been attached to other Government institutions in that country. The Roman Catholics took a pride in its renown, and they feared that its character would be materially altered by the Bill before the House. It had been stated that the House would not agree to denominational endowments, but he challenged the right of the House to come to such a conclusion as regarded Ireland. If the Bill should become law, and if they persisted in ignoring the feelings and wishes of the people of Ireland the question would be more seriously considered by them, and they would say that it was evidence to them that they must seek for redress of their grievances in the restoration of their own Parliament, in which Irishmen would have the management of their own affairs.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(1.) £25,615, to complete the sum for Royal Palaces.

(2.) £83,727, to complete the sum for Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked for explanations as to the increased charge for the services of the police connected with the keeping of Hyde Park and Kew Gardens, and wished to know if the public got value for their money?

MR. AYRTON presumed that that expenditure was required because the Parks were much frequented and were somewhat highly cultivated. He should be glad to get the police to perform that duty at a smaller cost, but the matter was not exactly within his power. The expense for Kew Gardens was no doubt large, but the gardens were kept in a high state of cultivation.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that Hyde Park was a highly-cultivated Park, but he did not know that the police cultivated

it. He supposed the police did not attend to the flowers, and it was to the police he had particularly referred.

MR. AYRTON said, that if a Park was in a high state of cultivation it all the more required to be protected by the police from the inroads of the public. If, however, everybody going into the Park was as well-behaved as his hon. Friend, of course, no police would be required; but the fact was, that there were people in the metropolis who did not exactly know how to use a Park, and who fancied that they could go there and do very much what they liked; and the Chief Commissioner of Police deemed a police force necessary—first, to protect the Park against the people, and then to protect the people against one another.

(3.) £128,431, to complete the sum for Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked for explanations as to an item for the erection of new buildings in Southampton in connection with the Ordnance Survey. He did not know what these buildings were, especially as he had expected, with everybody else, that the Ordnance Survey would come to an end soon.

MR. AYRTON said, the new buildings in question were necessary, because the old buildings where the business of the Ordnance Survey was carried on, and which were originally erected for military purposes, had to be pulled down. Arrangements had been made for selling the Ordnance maps in London, where a depot for supplying them to the trade had been established.

MR. F. S. POWELL asked what were the Royal monuments for the restoration of which sums were taken in this Vote, and also under whose guidance the restoration was taking place?

MR. AYRTON did not know why the hon. Gentleman should assume that the person charged with superintending the restoration of these monuments was incompetent to discharge the duty.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he expressed no opinion upon the competency or otherwise of the gentleman; he had asked a simple question.

MR. AYRTON replied that the monuments which were being restored were one of King John in Worcester Cathedral, and some monuments in Westminster.

ster Abbey, and that the restoration was taking place under the superintendence of an officer of the Department of Works.

(4.) £12,000, to complete the sum for Furniture, Public Departments.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked for some explanation with respect to two items which many people would think ought to go together—namely, £997 for Chelsea Hospital and £757 for the Military Asylum, Chelsea. There was also under the Head of Home Office, "Inspector of Anatomy 7s. 6d. The thing was very cheap if it was good.

MR. WHITWELL asked, whether the apartments which had been vacated by the removal of the Horse Guards to the War Office at Pall Mall were available for temporary offices?

MR. ANDERSON said, that the Vote for furniture was of a most unsatisfactory character. It seemed to be taken for granted that when a certain sum was spent on furniture in one year an equal sum should be asked for the next. That plan of taking the estimate for the coming year on the basis of the past was a most unsatisfactory one, but at the same time he was not prepared to point out a better.

MR. AYRTON said, the offices which had been vacated by the removal of the Horse Guards to Pall Mall were not empty; they were occupied by such persons connected with the administration of the Army as could be conveniently located there. With regard to the estimate for furniture, it must not be supposed that the same expenditure would take place in each office every year. If a great expenditure was made in one year on one office there would be very little the next; but taking all the public offices together, it was found that the total expenditure amounted to about the sum that was asked.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £25,670, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for the Buildings of the Houses of Parliament."

MR. BOWRING was glad that the First Commissioner of Works had so far

kept down the very large cost of the supply of fuel and gas for the Houses of Parliament, that the increase in the Vote only represented the great increase in the price of coal. He (Mr. Bowring) also asked what was about to be done with regard to the light in the clock tower, which had been very unsatisfactory of late as compared with previous years; and also whether means could be taken to continue the covered way between the cloak-room and the railway station, so that Members should not be exposed to the wet on rainy nights upon going to the train. The distance which was not under cover was only a few yards.

MR. AYRTON stated, with regard to the light in the clock tower, that before finally determining what light should be adopted, several persons were exhibiting the merits of their inventions at their own expense, and when the qualities and costs of each had been ascertained the decision of the Office of Works would be submitted to the House. With regard to the subway to the railway station, it would be difficult to continue the covered way to the cloak-room without making considerable alterations in the structure of the House. The opening at the other end would shortly be covered in by the building in course of erection there.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK remarked that a sum of £1,000 had been voted four years in succession to Mr. Herbert for his picture of the "Judgment of Daniel," and it had never been paid. Surely if it was not to be paid it would be better not to vote it.

MR. AYRTON explained that the sum in question had not been paid because the picture was not yet completed. When it was nearly completed the canvas exhibited signs of swelling, and the artist was unwilling to put it up in that condition. The picture was the work of an artist of great eminence and genius, which it was desirable they should possess, and the £1,000 had been inserted in the Votes in anticipation of its completion. The money would be paid as soon as the picture was placed in the House of Lords robing-room.

In answer to MR. RYLANDS,

MR. AYRTON said, that a plan was under consideration by which the staircase, which now came down to the Smoking Room from the lobby, would be continued upwards, so as to afford a private access to the lobby for Members called from Committee Rooms upstairs to divisions in the House.

MR. MONK drew attention to the item of £724 per annum which was paid as the rent of the official residence in Spring Gardens of the Clerk of the Parliaments. He thought this item was far too large, especially as the residence in question was at a considerable distance from the House. He would also ask whether a more convenient residence could not be found in the House itself?

MR. AYRTON said, that no doubt the original intention was that an official residence for the Clerk of the Parliaments should be provided for him in that building, and he could give no reason why that intention had not been carried out. In point of fact, the £724 referred to did not actually come out of the public pocket, inasmuch as the residence of the Clerk of the Parliaments was Crown property, and therefore the money that was paid out of the Exchequer with the one hand was received by the Woods and Forests with the other. At the same time, he admitted that the sum charged in the Estimates was out of all proportion with the amount of the salary which the official in question received, and might be regarded as being in the highest degree extravagant and improper. In his opinion, the Clerk of the Parliaments ought to receive an allowance for house rent, and should be called upon to provide himself with a residence. The present arrangement had been in existence for seven years; but it was, however, intended to provide the official in question with a house in the more immediate neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament, and therefore the present arrangement would at no distant day come to an end.

MR. SCLATER BOOTH wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works intended positively to state that an arrangement such as he had indicated had been actually entered into. He thought the right hon. Gentleman went too far when he characterized the existing arrangement as extravagant and improper.

MR. AYRTON had already stated that the arrangement to which he had alluded was under consideration. He must repeat that an arrangement under which an official receiving £2,000 per annum as salary was provided with a house valued at £724 per annum was an improper and an extravagant one.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH observed that the salary of the Clerk of the Parliaments was £4,000, and not £2,000, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman. It was scarcely the right thing for the right hon. Gentleman, holding such strong views upon the subject as he did, to place this item in the Estimates, and then come down to that House and vilify it.

MR. ANDERSON said, that after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, the Committee had no alternative but to reject the item. He would, therefore, move that the item be omitted.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £724, for Rent for the Official Residence of the Clerk of the Parliaments, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—
(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. BOWRING remarked that the salary of the Clerk of the Parliaments was £2,500, and not £4,000.

MR. AYRTON explained that it was impossible to omit the item, because a house must be provided for the Clerk of the Parliaments under the terms of the arrangement with him. The Woods and the Forests having raised the rent of the residence he now occupied, an arrangement had been entered into by which a residence would be provided for him more in proportion to his salary and his position.

MR. MUNTZ thought that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, the Committee should express an opinion that the amount of this item should be reduced. Therefore, if the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) would withdraw his Amendment to omit the item, he would move that it be reduced by £224.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK could not help wondering at the sudden display of virtuous indignation with regard to a sum that was paid with the one hand and received with the other.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH remarked that the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works in reference to this item was most extraordinary. The Clerk of the Parliaments had occupied his present official residence for 10 or 12 years, and yet the right hon. Gentleman had got up and made a speech which ought to require him to vote against the item he had himself placed in the Estimates.

MR. LOCKE wished to know whether, if the Clerk of the Parliaments gave up his present residence, there would still be any objection to a road being made from St. James's Park through Spring Gardens to Charing Cross? He thought the house in question was a great stumbling-block in the way of an important metropolitan improvement, which, some years ago, he had suggested might be made.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £724, for Rent, &c. of Official Residence of the Clerk of the Parliaments, be reduced by the sum of £224."—(Mr. Muntz.)

MR. WYKEHAM-MARTIN asked, whether it was not possible to find for this officer an equally good house at the amount of rent proposed by the hon. Member for Birmingham—namely, £500? Who in private life would think of giving a rent of £724 for a house in Spring Gardens?

MR. AYRTON said, that the improvement referred to by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) would not go in the direction he supposed, but through another House in Spring Gardens. Whether that improvement could be carried out would remain for the consideration of the Metropolitan Board of Works; or if the House liked to take the matter into its own hands and vote money for it, of course it would be for the House to do so. But knowing what large Votes would be asked for metropolitan improvements, he advised the House not to begin that operation.

MR. LOCKE said, he had never intended that the country should pay for the alteration; but the fact was the Government had always prevented the Metropolitan Board of Works from making the improvement to which he had referred.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON dissented from the view of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke), that it would be a public improvement to have a carriage way made in the locality in question. No doubt, it would be a convenience for the owners of carriages if such a way were made; but it would be extremely inconvenient to persons who liked to have that place of resort. With regard to the general tenor of the discussion, he thought it was rather unfair to the Clerk of the Parliaments to make observations about the amount of his salary, and the amount which the public paid for his residence. He remembered when that gentleman first became tenant of these premises. He thought it was at the time when Sir Benjamin Hall (the late Lord Llanover) was First Commissioner of Woods and Forests. It had been decided that the Clerk of the Parliaments in his official capacity should have an official residence. It happened that these premises were vacant, and it was suggested as a suitable arrangement that he should be lodged in them. At that period the amount of the rent did not represent the value of the house. The terms were subsequently altered, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works seemed to think that the Clerk of the Parliaments was responsible for that arrangement.

MR. RYLANDS said, not the slightest disrespect was intended to the Clerk of the Parliaments in the observations that had been made. All that was meant was that the present arrangement was an extravagant one. If the Committee would vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), the First Commissioner would, no doubt, make a more economical arrangement.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH protested against a Minister of the Crown vilifying Estimates which he had placed before the House. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner had said, in the plainest possible language, that this was an extravagant and improper arrangement. If that was so, he thought it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman not to have put this item in the Estimates.

MR. AYRTON said, he adhered to his opinion that this was an extravagant arrangement; but he had explained that it was only a temporary arrangement, and that the item ought to be voted until another residence was provided.

Mr. Sclater-Booth

If the Committee insisted on the proposed reduction, he would not object.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 56; Noes 85: Majority 29.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. ANDERSON noticed an item of £9,809 for external and casual repairs, and asked whether anything could be done to check the decay of the stonework of the Houses of Parliament?

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN observed that the decay was going on very rapidly, and it was important to know whether the experiment had been successful in any way.

MR. AYRTON said, the use of one kind of coating as a preservative of the stone was believed to have succeeded, but time was the only test of success. The first experiments made some years ago were not adequately recorded. No steps were taken to ascertain the nature of the materials, and the mode in which they were used; but it was now proposed to proceed in a more methodical manner. The stone which was most decayed was being gradually cut out.

(6.) £48,000, to complete the sum for New Offices, Downing Street.

MR. BOWRING asked whether those buildings would be completed within the estimate; whether the recommendation of the Committee on Public Accounts would be adopted with respect to them; and, whether, as had been reported, they were not rectangular?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH took it for granted that the important recommendation of the Committee on Public Accounts would not be adopted this year, as the Estimates had been framed before that recommendation was made.

MR. AYRTON thought the building would be completed within the estimate of £285,000. There might be one or two small contingencies, but that amount would not be materially exceeded. As to the buildings not being rectangular, they had been designed to meet the line of the street, and as Parliament Street was not at right angles with Downing Street, there was an obliquity in the face of the building as compared with the other three sides. It was not intended this year to make any change in conformity with the Report of the Committee, but the subject would receive due consideration next year.

(7.) £11,840, to complete the sum for Sheriff Courts, Scotland.

(8.) £35,420, to complete the sum for Enlargement of the National Gallery.

(9.) £16,500, to complete the sum for New Buildings, Glasgow University.

(12.) £120,607, to complete the sum for Works and Buildings, Post Office and Land Revenue.

MR. MUNTZ objected to the charge for furniture, £9,320, as excessive.

MR. AYRTON explained that the item included telegraph tables and other articles which were not permanent fittings, the outlay resulting from the extension of the service.

MR. BOWRING asked whether the sums proposed to be voted for telegraph offices were to be applied to the repayment of the money borrowed without proper authority from the Savings-banks' funds?

MR. AYRTON replied in the negative.

(13.) £4,547, to complete the sum for the British Museum Buildings, &c.

(14.) £30,605, to complete the sum for New Buildings for County Courts, &c.

(15.) £16,773, to complete the sum for New Buildings, Department of Science and Art.

MR. MILLER inquired what arrangements had been made for the sale of the ordnance maps in Scotland? He had been told that the arrangements would be complete on the 1st of April, but that was not so, although no doubt some few maps could be obtained.

MR. F. S. POWELL asked when the survey was expected to be completed? The whole country bore the expense, but until the completion of the survey only a portion of the country reaped the benefit.

MR. AYRTON said, that it had been found impracticable to sell the maps to the public through the post-offices. A central dépôt had been established in London, from which copies might be obtained through any bookseller, while agents had been appointed in the principal English towns, and dépôts established at Dublin and Edinburgh. The survey at its present rate of progress would occupy 11 or 12 years more.

MR. GOLDNEY asked how it was that a further sum was to be taken for expenses in connection with the pier at Dover?

MR. BAXTER said, that the works at Dover had not advanced so rapidly as was expected, owing to alterations made by the War Office, upwards of £10,000 having still to be spent. He hoped the Vote would be considerably reduced next year. The charge upon the Government would only be £640, as the remainder of the Vote, £760, was defrayed by the local authorities.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, there was nothing taken for Alderney, and he wished to know whether it was intended to abandon those works?

MR. BAXTER said, that point was still under the consideration of the Government.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £150, to complete the sum for Portland Harbour.

MR. MACFIE called attention to the state of certain footpaths connected with Government property in Leith. These footpaths had been neglected to such an extent that they had become injurious to the health of the public. The Town Council of Leith had remonstrated over and over again to no purpose, and the only alternative was to draw the attention of Parliament to the subject.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH thought the Vote should be postponed. Notice had been given of the introduction of a Bill which he was told would, among other things, provide for the rating of Government property by law; and a great portion of this sum would not therefore be required.

MR. BAXTER believed, on the contrary, that whatever action the Government or the House might take in this matter, a great proportion of this sum would be required for the year.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he wished to call attention to the very unsatisfactory state of the Wellington Monument in St. Paul's, towards the completion of which very little progress had been made. The original estimate had been £14,000; the revised estimate amounted to £21,500, but the monument as it now appeared was nothing better than a great chimney-piece. Mr. Stevens was no doubt a man of ability, but he had entirely failed to fulfil his contract with the Government, and he thought some explanation should be given why so much delay had arisen in completing what was intended by the nation to be a worthy monument to a great hero. If Mr. Stevens' health was too infirm to carry on the work, some other architect should be appointed to complete the design.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not at all wonder at the complaints which were made of the state of this work at the present moment. It had been one series of misfortunes from the beginning to the end. Mr. Stevens had been appointed by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicester, when First Commissioner, to execute this work, receiving certain payments from the Government. He was a very able artist, but not a good financier. His accounts and estimates got into confusion, and the work came to a state of almost absolute stagnation. It was taken out of the hands of Mr. Stevens altogether, and Mr. Coleman was appointed as a gentleman who should be answerable for the conclusion of the work. He was to employ Mr. Stevens to do the work required; and things went on in that way very well till Mr. Stevens unfortunately became ill—quite unable to do anything, for not only was he prostrate in health, but his mind appeared entirely gone. What the Government, therefore, proposed to do was to call on Mr. Coleman to complete the work. He had reason to believe the work was very near completion, and when completed it would not be unworthy of the nation or the hero whose achievements it was intended to celebrate.

MR. J. GOLDSMID said, he could not help observing that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had entirely confirmed the statement he had made last year. Mr. Stevens was totally incapable of completing the work. The part in which progress had been made was not the sculptural portion of the monument, nor had the proper casts been made. What Mr. Stevens had been employed to do he had not done, and Mr. Coleman, who was appointed to finish the monument, was not a sculptor but an upholsterer. He thought the Government should be held responsible for the proper completion of the monument, not one of the upholsterers of the metropolis.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Of course the Government are responsible, and I can only congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the prescience which he discovered last year in the statement he then made.

MR. GOLDNEY wished to know whether Mr. Coleman was under an obligation to complete the monument for the sum mentioned in the revised estimate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied in the affirmative.

MR. J. GOLDSMID said, he should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman that on previous occasions, whenever any First Commissioner of Works pressed Mr. Stevens to go on with the models, that gentleman always fell ill. Therefore, it did not require any great amount of prescience on his part to hint that the same thing might occur again.

MR. GOLDNEY hoped, under the circumstances, that the Vote would be postponed until a definite statement could be laid before the Committee as to the completion of the monument.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be unnecessary to postpone the Vote, as everything which would require any very special artistic power had already been accomplished.

Vote agreed to.

(22.) £67,000, to complete the sum for the Natural History Museum.

MR. HINDE PALMER submitted that a portion of the ground which had been acquired for the Natural History Museum at South Kensington ought to be set apart for the erection of a Patent Museum.

MR. MACFIE thought the suggestion well deserved the attention of the Government.

MR. DILLWYN remarked that South Kensington had a wonderful power of drawing public money, and that he should have preferred to see all the Natural History collections centred in the British Museum. He commented on the magnitude of the estimate, and asked for information respecting the state the contracts were now in.

MR. AYRTON replied, that there was nothing in the estimate to prevent the construction of a Patent Museum. With respect to the financial history of the Natural History Museum, the facts were as follows:—About 10 years ago the House deliberately decided that ground should be purchased for the site, and in 1866-7 a Vote was proposed for the erection of the Museum. The matter was not proceeded with in that year, but Mr. Waterhouse, the architect appointed by the Government to design the building, arrived at an estimate of about £508,000 for its construction. The subject then came under his consideration, and he informed Mr. Waterhouse that the estimate ought not to exceed £350,000. Fresh plans were accordingly prepared, a tender was made, and the sum ultimately arrived at, with all its contingencies, was £395,000, the actual contract being £352,000, and the additional amount being required for the expense of the architect and other contingent services. They had a good guarantee that for the sum named a building suitable for the object in view would be constructed.

MR. HUNT asked when the contract was to be completed?

MR. AYRTON said, the contract was to be completed in three years from the beginning of the present year.

MR. SEYMOUR inquired when and where Mr. Waterhouse's designs might be seen?

MR. AYRTON said, they might be seen at the Office of Works by any hon. Member who desired to inspect them. He might mention that they had been already exhibited in the Library of the House.

MR. SEYMOUR: Yes, three days before the House broke up for the long vacation.

Vote agreed to.

(23.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £9,010, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for New Buildings, Maintenance and Repair of Buildings, and other Expenses connected therewith, of the Metropolitan Police Courts."

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK complained of the state of the Metropolitan Police Courts, and stated that the magistrates had to pass whole days in courts which were simply a disgrace to this great metropolis.

MR. RYLANDS wished to know how it was that the metropolis, with all its wealth, came to ask the country to provide it with police courts at the public expense, when the provinces had to provide their police courts at their own expense?

MR. WHEELHOUSE also thought the Metropolitan Police Courts were not kept properly clean or painted.

MR. R. N. FOWLER submitted it was most important that those courts, which were maintained in the interest of justice, should be kept in good order.

MR. AYRTON said, that the building of another court in Bow Street was under consideration. There was also projected an enlargement of the police court at Marylebone. The subject of the provision by the State of the police courts of the metropolis was part of a much larger question, and he might as well ask how it was that the metropolis paid so large a share of the house duty?

MR. RYLANDS moved the rejection of the Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 65: Majority 15.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £57,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for the Purchase of a Site, Erection of Building, and other Expenses for the New Courts of Justice and Offices belonging thereto."

MR. SCLATER BOOTH said, he thought the Committee would like to have some information upon the subject. He would remind hon. Gentlemen that the statutory limit for the erection of the new Palace of Justice was £750,000, of which £36,000 had been expended. He had been informed that tenders had recently been sent in for the erection of the courts ranging from £700,000 to £1,000,000, and if the tender accepted should exceed the statutory limit, he wished to know how it was proposed to get over the difficulty? He also wished to know whether any estimate had been received for the building, and, if so, what was the amount of the tender which had been accepted?

MR. AYRTON replied that tenders had been received, but the lowest tender exceeded the statutory limit. He had not yet had time to go into the tenders with the architect, who was now engaged in altering the plan, and had no doubt that the building could be erected for the sum originally named.

MR. HUNT inquired by what sum the lowest tender exceeded the statutory limit?

MR. AYRTON said, it would not, he thought, be for the public interest that he should now give the particulars called for.

MR. HUNT suggested that the Vote should be postponed until the right hon. Gentleman was in a position to give the necessary information to the Committee.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, it should be remembered that since the statutory limit was fixed the price of all kinds of materials and of labour had risen 30 per cent. It was very undesirable that the building should be compressed so as to bring it within the cost fixed some years ago. Such a proceeding must tend to the sacrifice of the building and the curtailment of the public convenience.

MR. WHITWELL said, he also thought it would be very unwise to diminish the size and capacity of the building to bring the cost within the particular sum fixed on by Parliament. He expressed a hope that the widening of Temple Bar would be carried out, for the purpose of improving the approach to these Courts.

MR. AYRTON said, that he was quite willing to postpone the Vote.

MR. BAXTER thought that a fair case had been made out for the postponement of the Vote, and would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Baxter.)

MR. GOLDSMID said, it should be understood that the Law Courts ought to be completed at a cost commensurate with the style of the building and the accommodation to be given. An increase of £50,000 or £250,000 ought not to interfere in the erection of a suitable building. He would recommend that the money which it was proposed to expend on pulling down and rebuilding a new Admiralty and War Office should be expended on the Law Courts.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow: Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

REGISTER FOR PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTORS (re-committed) BILL—[Bill 105.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 7th April.]

Clause 3 (Alteration of dates).

MR. C. E. LEWIS said, he must take occasion again to object to the dates fixed in the Bill as inconvenient, and would move an Amendment to the effect that nothing in the clause should alter the date of any municipal election.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, to leave out from the word "Provided," to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

MR. DIXON opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would require the poll to be kept open after dark, and with the aid of artificial light.

MR. HIBBERT also opposed it, because it involved a change that would be very inconvenient to every borough in this country. During the Vacation he had endeavoured to ascertain the opinions of the different boroughs with respect to such an alteration, and he found that they were almost unanimously averse to it. The clause as it now stood would do away with much annoyance to voters, whose convenience ought to be consulted in preference to that of the Revising Barrister. The dates fixed by the Bill had been arranged after consultation with the representatives both of boroughs and counties, and the Bill ought to be tried as the Government had framed it. If it was not found to work satisfactorily, it could easily be amended in a future year.

MR. HUNT wished to know what the inconvenience which the Amendment would cause really was. When he had suggested at a previous stage that the 1st of January should be substituted for the 1st of November, he was told that this would necessitate canvassing in Christmas week; but that objection would not apply to the 1st of December. There was a blind and bigoted prejudice on the part of the old Tories on the other side of the House in favour of the 1st of November; but, for his own part, he was not opposed to a change that was beneficial, as the one now proposed by his hon. Friend would be.

MR. DODDS objected to the change proposed, believing the time fixed by the Bill the most convenient part of the year.

MR. COLLINS supported the Amendment, thinking that more time ought to be given for the completion of the registration, so as to render it as perfect as possible. He should prefer that the commencement of the process of making out the lists should be antedated, instead of deferred to a later period.

MR. MUNTZ was one of those "Old Tories" who preferred to leave well alone, and not to make changes without good cause being shown for them. He hoped they would not throw the municipal elections a month later in the year, when the daylight was shorter.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 39: Majority 46.

MR. BRAND said, he wished to remind the Committee that at present persons were allowed to the 1st of June to pay the rates due on the 1st of January. But this Bill required that the rates should be paid by the 25th of April. Unless a Proviso was introduced to pro-

Fellows at Oxford (exclusive of All Souls College) was 338, and if to this number 30 Fellows were added for All Souls, the total would amount to 368. Excluding All Souls, 187 Fellows were returned as non-resident, and he believed that 29 out of the 30 Fellows of All Souls were not statutorily resident. At Cambridge there were 297 Fellows, exclusive of Trinity College, where there were 60 Fellowships; 170 were returned as being absent, and, if 20 were added for Trinity, the total number of absentees would be brought up to 190. He admitted it was inconvenient to bring forward a University question while a Commission was sitting; but whatever changes might be made in the future, the present system of Fellowships, by which Fellows were made simple annuitants, and obtained large sums of money as the result of a successful examination, could not possibly last. He had this practical object in view—that, inasmuch as a considerable number of Fellowships became vacant and were filled up each year, they might be enabled under the Bill to get rid of those Fellowships by offering the holders of them a liberal amount of compensation. Whoever examined closely the employment of the University endowments would come to this conclusion—that there existed great waste of their funds, and that the great purposes of a University were not fulfilled. To show that he was not alone in that view, he would call attention to some opinions expressed in the evidence given before the Commission. Mr. Randall was asked what he took to be the great defect of the present system, and his answer was—"A waste of the great endowments of the University." In questioning Mr. Chase, Lord Salisbury said—

"On the one hand there is a want of money to cultivate the new branches of knowledge, and on the other a great amount of money given to people who take no part in the work of the University."

And the answer was, "Yes." Dr. Liddon took the same view; and Sir Benjamin Brodie said there was such a plethora of Fellowships that he thought it would be a good thing to diminish their number; and in another part of his evidence he said that to take nearly the whole resources of the University and to devote them to Fellowships seemed to be a total waste of means. The Dean of Christ Church, on the same occasion, stated that the Collegiate system was forming itself, but that to form itself completely money would be required. Now, what was the amount of money which, taken away from the proper purposes of the University, went towards the payment of those enormous prizes? Roughly speaking, it amounted at Oxford to the sum of £90,000 or £95,000 a-year; and if they added £35,000 paid for scholarships, the total would be about £130,000 per annum. Professor Rogers calculated that if the sums paid for the various scholarships attached to the schools of the country were added to the sums paid for the Oxford scholarships it would bring the whole amount paid for scholarships and Exhibitions alone to £80,000 a-year. He had not, however, had an opportunity of testing the accuracy of that calculation; but, in round numbers, the revenue of the University and Colleges of Oxford would be found to amount to something very near £250,000 per annum. With such an endowment the country had a right to expect that the University should show a large amount of work done. Now, did the system under which the Universities were placed allow them to show a return of work done, at all in proportion to the amount of their revenues? How many students were there at the University of Oxford who matriculated with the intention of remaining till they took their degree? By a Return which was placed before the Commission it appeared that in 1860 410 matriculated, while only 306 took their Bachelor's degree. In 1862, 433 matriculated and 306 took their Bachelor's degree. In 1864 the numbers were 476 and 324; in 1866, 517 and 306; in 1868, 579 and 352. The same was true of Cambridge. Mr. Hamerton, in speaking of the year 1866, said that of 576 who matriculated the probability was that not more than 450 would take their degree. But adding 150 to the highest number he had quoted from the Return—namely, 352—they had about 500, an extremely liberal calculation of the number who in each year seriously intended to obtain degrees; and if they divided the £250,000 by 500 they would have £500 a-year for each man taking a degree, or £100 a-year for each if he remained five years at the University. Again, the Commissioners had before them a Return of the honours taken during seven years from 1860 to 1866, counting every class and every final school. The honours amounted to 939, which gave an average for each year of the seven of 133. Adding something for those who took honours in Moderations, the number would be about 250, so that practically a sum of £1,000 was paid to every man of the 250 by the time he left the University. Now, what would be the effect of allowing the Fellowships to be held for 10 years? The Commissioners calculated that in that case the vacancies each year would average 35. Taking the last three years of the seven he had referred to—and they were the best years—there were 117 First Classes gained every time. If they took the proportion of 35 Fellowships a-year as becoming vacant, the vacancies for those three years would have amounted to 105, so that, in fact, the torrent of prizes would be so great under such a system that there would be no competition for them between First Class men. Every man who could scrape himself into a First Class would be at least likely to obtain a Fellowship. The one great element—a powerful body of teachers—was lacking in the English Universities, while in the great German Universities it was amply secured. In the latter, indeed, the revenues were principally spent in this way, each teacher having a small province of instruction, of which he could make himself a perfect master, and the students being charged the lowest possible rates; while in England our infinitely larger resources were devoted to a prize system, which was barren and even mischievous. At Leipzig, with 800 or 900 students, the Faculty of Law, for example, consisted of a considerable number of Professors, who lectured on Roman law, German public law, ecclesiastical law, mining law, contracts, and other branches. The aim in Germany was to make the instrument of teaching as perfect as possible, while in England it was to perfect the instrument of examining. One result of this difference was that while University education was cheap in Germany it was dear in England; and the cause was clear, for, like everyone who was lavish in one direction, our Universities were obliged to act shabbily in another. In Germany the student paid only 16s. for matriculation, and for 17s. a term he could get five hours a week of the best lectures on philosophy, while the highest fee he was called on to pay in law or medicine was 34s. He could also attend a large number of free lectures, every ordinary Professor having to give at least two a week without charge. Now, in England, money being spent in great prizes, all sorts of expenses were thrown on the students. At Cambridge private teaching was deemed almost indispensable to a high place on the Tripos—Dr. Bateson, the Master of St. John's, stating in his evidence that an outlay on this head of about £40 a-year was almost essential to attaining such a position; and with keen competition and high prices there would always be a tendency to this. Mr. Hammond, moreover, regarded private teachers as supplying a want which the College lecturer could never satisfy. At Oxford, owing to better management, private teaching had much diminished; but in both Universities, College tutors were a serious expense. At Oxford the expense of them amounted to £20,000 a-year, and Dr. Bateson's estimate of £80 as the average annual charge on each student would give a similar total. So little public teaching was there at Oxford that the new class of "non-ascripts," formed for the sake of persons with small means, had to depend on the compassion of some of the Colleges in getting sufficient teaching to carry them through the schools. A non-ascript had to pay £4 10s. a-year for University dues, and £1 1s. for examination fees, while he was supposed to pay £10 10s. for tuition, some of the Colleges kindly admitting them for £2 a term to three hours a-week of lectures. Now, for the seven Prussian Universities any student by passing an examination could, in his last year, be admitted into a seminary; but this aid to students was very limited in extent amounting in 1861 to 30,228 thalers, out of a total outlay of 690,388 thalers. This item was, therefore, only 1-19th of the whole expenditure; whereas at Oxford more than half the revenue was devoted to Fellowships and Scholarships. A larger proportion of the population attended the German Universities. In Germany, according to Mr. Matthew Arnold, there was one matriculated student to every 2,600 of the population; and in Baden and the Saxon Duchies even one to every 1,100 of the population. In England, under the present system, they were able to send to the Universities only one student to every 5,800 of the population. He admitted that the figures had, during the last few years, slightly changed for the better in our Universities. Speaking of the practice among Oxford teachers of not making teaching the profession of their lives, but of following it merely for a short time, Professor Conington found fault, not with the individuals, but with the system, and said that Oxford was to them simply a convenience; they took it as they found it. Again, Sir Benjamin Brodie stated that they would look in vain to the University to supply teachers; that he had known of cases in which application had been made and teachers could not be found; and that the great object was to secure an efficient body of teachers in the University. Referring to the German Universities, Sir Benjamin Brodie also said there was no doubt that they had the most efficient body of teachers. By these great prizes not only did we not spend our money in the way that would yield the greatest return and best fulfil the first purpose of a University, but we were doing positive harm in respect to the education. The effect of those examinations pressed so heavily on the men who went to the University, from the first day they were there to the last, that all feeling of their responsibility was taken away. They were forced into a certain rut and driven along a road at the end of which was a great examination. Professor Seeley, writing on that subject, said the effect of those prizes and the subserviency they caused to the examinations was to vulgarize the minds of students. If the higher branches of study were to do them any good, they should be followed for their own sake. Was not the work by which the student profited the most that which was most spontaneous, most self-chosen, and least mechanical? It was a common saying among Cambridge tutors that such and such a man would do well in the schools if he would not think too much—meaning by this that if he gave himself up entirely to the work before him, without questioning himself whether it was the line for which he was best fitted, and which would most enlarge his faculties and improve his nature—if he put himself implicitly in the hands of his teachers and “coaches,” he would be more likely to do well in the schools. A young man who had thus carried off all the honours and prizes in the work he had to do had been known to sink back exhausted, wishing, like Alexander, that he had another world to conquer, but not knowing into what direction then to turn his energies. That must be the effect of the tremendous competition which now existed for those great money rewards which applied an artificial stimulus to force all their best men into a particular groove. The system, moreover, did not give a full and free opportunity for new subjects of education to grow up and assume their proper places; it being sometimes objected to a new subject, when proposed, that it was not a good subject for examination. Those rewards were highly artificial, and very unlike those obtained in the struggle of life. One success achieved in life induced a man to strive after still further success, but the reverse was the case in regard to these Fellowships; a man having once succeeded, he held his prize, whatever he did afterwards. The belief existed that it was impossible to educate Englishmen except by means of great prizes and rewards. This had once been said of some other country, when Leibnitz described the system as “the sophism of idleness.” No doubt idleness was at the bottom of our present system. It involved less originality and less effort than a more perfect and more useful system. Its effect upon the teachers was unquestionably bad; it destroyed all originality, and prevented a Professor giving his best and most original thoughts to his pupils, because he was anxious that his pupils should be able to answer a set of stereotyped questions, rather than that they should be educated. The success of German University life was promoted by the freedom allowed both to the teacher and the taught. France and Austria might be referred to by way of contrast. Austria had been well described as being essentially a country of examinations, and in which nobody worked; and competition in France was more severe than in England. What, practically speaking, had been the result of the two systems? In Germany they had severe examinations for various posts; but they steadily set their faces against the system of competitive examination. France had adopted it, and so had we; but he did not know that we had any great reason to be well satisfied with the results. Looking back to the last 15 years, we had, no doubt, obtained from both Universities a certain number of distinguished men; but there was a growing feeling that we did not get men of the same strength of character, of the same independence of thought, or so free from the ties of conventionalism as we used to get under a bolder and freer system. He wished that in such matters more trust should be put in higher motives. Let them have faith in their countrymen, and put in them a trust analogous to that which had been reposed by the people of Germany in Germans, so that men might come with the smallest pittance of money, and yet might acquire the great rewards which the prosecution of learning presented. Then our great national Universities would again become great nurseries of national intelligence—great centres of life and force to the whole nation.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to limit the Compensation awarded on abolition of Fellowships in the Colleges of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge."—(Mr. Ashurst Herbert.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE observed that he would not follow his hon. Friend into any of his arguments. Considering how many reviews and magazines there were of great, though unequal, merit, it was rather unfair that what might have been a readable article in one of them should have been wasted upon these empty benches. He however protested against the whole scope and system of this proposed Bill. It had been reserved for his hon. Friend to invent "prophetic" legislation. This Bill was to circumscribe, and in circumscribing also to circumvent, a possible measure which might or might not be produced at some totally unknown future time, in consequence of the Report of a Commission which had not yet reported. It was trifling with the time of the House; and he (Mr. Beresford Hope) protested against the Bill as an attack upon the privileges of private Members—an attempt to take up a certain portion of that time which some private Members said was already too limited, with a view of legislation which could never be pushed forward. Not only did the hon. Member bring forward this Bill in contravention of all the principles which guided their deliberations, but he had supported it in a speech which he might be allowed to say was rudis indigestaque moles, and which had no relevancy to its subject matter. On that account he begged leave to announce that when the Speaker put the Question he (Mr. Beresford Hope) would answer it in the negative, and would take the sense of the House.

Question put.

CITY OF LONDON VOLUNTEERS. THE ARTILLERY COMPANY'S DRILL GROUND.—RESOLUTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK rose to call attention to the inconvenience suffered by the City of London Volunteers from the want of a convenient drill ground; and to move—

"That Her Majesty's Government be requested to take such steps as they may deem necessary to obtain for the City of London Volunteers the use of the Artillery Ground in Finsbury at such times as it is not required by the Honourable Artillery Company or the City of London Militia."

The hon. Baronet said, the City of London Volunteers consisted of three regiments of Rifles, one Brigade of Artillery, and one Battalion of Engineers, making a total of 4,500 men, with an average attendance of more than 1,000 a-week. At present, however, they had no drill ground and were compelled to go all the way to Hyde Park. It was hardly necessary to point out the inconvenience of large bodies of armed men walking through the streets. The City Volunteers would be both more numerous and more efficient if they enjoyed greater facilities of preparation. Now, there was in the heart of the City a large open piece of ground especially intended for military purposes, and at present almost unused. It was no less than seven acres in extent, situated close to Finsbury Square, within a quarter of a mile of the Bank of England, and well supplied with all the necessary accommodation. This piece of ground was now occupied—or rather, he should say, held—by the Honourable Artillery Company under two leases from the Corporation, and the Court of Lieutenancy of the City. These were not ordinary leases but leases for a special purpose—namely, "for the purposes of drill or military exercises," and liberty was expressly reserved to the Trained Bands of the City of London to "muster, train, and exercise therein." Now, the City of London Volunteers regarded themselves—and he hoped that this House would consider they were justly entitled to regard themselves—as the present representatives of the ancient Trained Bands. Under those circumstances, the Court of Lieutenancy for the City of London wrote to the Honourable Artillery Company in 1871, requesting them to make such arrangements as would enable the Volunteers to use the ground when they did not themselves require it, and when it was not in use by the Militia. This they declined to do. Again, last year the City of London Volunteer Committee decided to make another attempt, and the Lord Mayor, as chairman of that Committee, placed himself in communication with the Secretary of the Honourable Artillery Company, but with no better success. Lastly, this Spring the commanding officers of the Volunteers, unwilling to trouble this House or the Government if they could avoid doing so, once more addressed the Honourable Artillery Company, but without effect. Of course this could not be complained of if the Honourable Artillery Company really required the ground for their own purposes. Such, however, was not the case. He had no desire to hold up the Artillery Company to ridicule; but he must be allowed to state facts. The Company, according to the last list which he had seen, numbered on paper about 620 members; but it appeared from the official Return that of this number 239 did not attend a single drill, 140 attended less than nine drills in the year, and only 150 out of the 620 attended the number of drills necessary to constitute a volunteer efficient according to the present rules of the War Office. The average effectives for the last three years had been 250; but under the new regulations, which require musketry instruction, not above 150 would have ranked as effectives. He was informed that at the Artillery division drill on Mondays 12 men was about the average; that the other divisions drill on Thursdays, and did not generally muster more than 50 men; yet this very small corps held, at a nominal rent from the City authorities, magnificent head-quarters, drill-rooms, armoury, 100 yards' rifle range, guard-room, mess-room, ball-room, covered drill-yard, and seven acres of drill-ground in the heart of the City. A small portion of the buildings was paid for by the Company itself, and this no one proposed to touch; but in saying that they held the rest at a nominal rent he was understating his case, because, although they paid about £300 a-year for it, they had let off a portion for £2,400 a-year; so that they really enjoyed a subsidy of over £2,000 a-year, or considerably more than £100 a-year for each effective member. In considering, moreover, the expense at which this corps was maintained, we must remember that land near the Bank of England sells at the rate of £10,000,000 sterling per acre. The land in question was not worth so much; but putting it at half that price, here was a piece of land worth an immense sum of money, magnificent buildings, with a considerable and increasing income, all devoted to a corps which did not number 200 effectives. It was true the land was also used by the City of London Militia, but only for a few days in the year, and the Volunteers would not wish to interfere in any way with them. He felt that, under these circumstances, the House would sympathize with the natural wish of the Volunteers to have the power of drilling in a piece of ground which was so eminently suitable for the purpose, and which had been set aside by the City of London from time immemorial as a piece of ground for the use of the armed forces of the City. When the Artillery Company was the only representative of these forces they had the exclusive occupation of the ground; but the leases under which they held expressly stated that it was to be used for military purposes, and subject to the rights of the Trained Bands. This was no new question, but one which had been already discussed and decided by Parliament. When the Militia was enrolled at the close of the last century there was a difficulty about a drill ground, as there was now with reference to the Volunteers; then, as now, the Honourable Artillery Company stood on what they called their rights, and Parliament then interfered, as he hoped it would interfere now. By 36 Geo. III., c. 92, it was provided:—

"And whereas the said Militia, being an amendment or regulation of the ancient Trained

Bands of the City of London, be it enacted that the said Militia already raised and to be raised by virtue of this Act, shall possess and enjoy all and singular the rights and privileges which were possessed and enjoyed by the ancient Trained Bands of the City of London, and which are not varied, altered, or taken away by this Act."

Under this clause, which showed that, in the opinion of Parliament, the Honourable Artillery Company had morally no exclusive right to the ground, it had ever since been used by the Militia, though, as a matter of fact, they only occupied it for a very few days in the year. He believed that the Honourable Artillery Company only existed during Her Majesty's pleasure. If it terminated, the lands and buildings which it held would revert to the Corporation and the Court of Lieutenancy. He should greatly regret the disappearance of so old a corps; but the question would necessarily arise, if it obstructed the public interests and interfered with the strength and efficiency of the Volunteers. The second objection which he thought might perhaps be brought against his Motion—namely, that this was not a case for the interference of Parliament or of the Government, he had already partly answered by showing that he was only asking for the Volunteers that which Parliament had already granted to the Militia. Moreover, the House would recollect that in the Military Forces Bill passed last year the Secretary of State for War was authorized to raise a sum of £50,000 to provide a metropolitan drill ground. That, therefore, was a matter which concerned, not merely the City Volunteers, but the country generally. It was obviously the duty of Government to take care that existing grounds were fully occupied before they spent large sums of money in providing new ones. It might be said that if the case was so clear, why did not the Volunteers assert their rights to use the Artillery Ground? But to establish a legal right would be a very tedious and costly affair. There were, moreover, certain technical differences between the constitution of the old Trained Bands and the Volunteers which would, of course, be urged against the claim; though he thought no one could deny that the Volunteers, as the armed force of the City, did in truth and in substance represent the old Trained Bands. He hoped that Parliament and Her Majesty's Government would assent to his Motion. He asked that in the name of the Volunteers; but it seemed to him to be desirable in the interests of the Honourable Artillery Company also; for he must say it was a grave scandal that the Volunteers should be compelled to march to a distance for a drill-ground, and that the public should be put to a considerable expense, when there was in the heart of the City a piece of ground in every way suitable, which had been and was now set aside by the City authorities especially for that purpose, and which, as he had conclusively shown, was not and could not be fully occupied by the Honourable Artillery Company. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. MELLY seconded the Resolution.

"That Her Majesty's Government be requested to take such steps as they may deem necessary to obtain for the City of London Volunteers the use of the Artillery Ground in Finsbury at such times as it is not required by the Honourable Artillery Company or the City of London Militia."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, he rose, after the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone, because he thought that by making a short statement and reading two or three short paragraphs, he might render further discussion unnecessary and save the time of the House. The object which the hon. Baronet wished to accomplish was a very proper one. It was to provide exercising ground for the City Volunteers, who were without any such convenience. The West End Volunteers had nothing to complain of in that respect. They had the Parks, which were within easy distance, and they had open spaces on which to parade, accorded to them by public bodies and private persons, if one could use such a term when speaking of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who allowed a regiment to drill in his grounds at Lambeth. The City Volunteers were not so fortunate. They had to parade in the streets—amid a crowd of passengers and among carts and carriages. The hon. Baronet had told the House that the Artillery Company were in possession of a very good drill-ground in Finsbury; but he had not told the House that this ground was as indisputably the right and property of the Company as any house or property could be. The Honourable Artillery Company had held from time immemorial about eight acres of ground behind Finsbury Square, in the City of London. Half was held—with considerable house property adjoining—under a renewable lease from the Corporation of the City of London, the other half was held for the residue of a 99 years' lease from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. For these leases the Company had paid considerable sums. In both leases was reserved the right of the Militia to use the ground on four days in the week during the four weeks they were usually called out; but, subject to that, the ground, and the right of using it, belonged exclusively to the Artillery Company. In addition to the rental received from the Company's houses, the members contributed yearly subscriptions for maintaining the body without any cost to the public or contribution. In that state of the case it was suggested on the part of the Volunteers that they had the same rights as the Militia over the ground of the Artillery Company. The latter denied that there was any foundation for any such claim, and they were confirmed in that denial by the opinion of the Attorney General and of Mr. Bowen, to whom were submitted the titles under which the Company held the ground in question. The Artillery Company, recognizing the disadvantages which the City Volunteers were placed under by having no place to parade in save the streets, were willing to ask the trustees of their property to take such steps as might enable them to permit other corps to use the Artillery Ground upon payment of an agreed compensation. Unfortunately, at the very time when that was about to be agreed to, the City Volunteers sent, through their Colonels, the following letter:—

"Gentlemen,—We, the undersigned Commanding Officers of the Volunteer Regiments of the City of London, who claim to be the successors of the London Train Bands, have the honour to request that you will appoint a committee to meet us, with a view to arrange for the use of the ground and premises at Finsbury, now occupied by the Honourable Artillery Company, by our various regiments, according to the provisions of the leases in favour of the Train Bands under which the land and premises are held.

Colonel Loyd Lindsay

"We have the honour to remain, Gentlemen your obedient servants,

"ARTHUR D. HAYTER, Lieutenant Colonel commanding 1st City of London Rifle Volunteers.

"ROBERT P. LAURIE, Lieutenant Colonel commanding 3rd London Rifle Volunteers.

"H. GARNET MAR, Lieutenant Colonel commanding 1st London Engineer Volunteers."

Here was a distinct claim made by the City Volunteers, who called themselves the London Trained Bands, to the ground and premises. The Artillery Company, on receipt of this "Stand-and-deliver-up-your-property" document, refused to proceed with the very liberal proposal which he had described. The Volunteers, on this being made known to them, withdrew the letter written by the colonels, but had never withdrawn the claim to the property. It must be evident to the House that so long as this claim was asserted no arrangement could be come to, because it would be as if the Artillery Company were endeavouring to buy off a just claim by making a concession. When two parties claimed the same property, and persisted in their claims, there was only one course open to them, and that was to go before the Law Courts and have their rights decided. He invited the hon. Baronet to proceed in this legitimate manner; but unless the hon. Baronet was very fond of a law suit and its expenses, he would hesitate to do so with the opinion of the Attorney General before him. He had now shown that the Artillery Company had an undoubted right to their parade and drill-ground, and that if there was any dispute about it, the House of Commons was not the proper place wherein to discuss it. If the hon. Baronet would, on the part of the City Volunteers, undertake to withdraw unreservedly all those unsound claims which they had set up, he would endeavour to bring about an amicable arrangement for the advantage and benefit of the City corps; but the Resolution of the hon. Baronet did not facilitate matters, for its terms were quite inadmissible, and he was sure they could not be accepted by the Government.

Mr. CARDWELL said, he thought the speech to which the House had just listened presented a fair prospect of a settlement of this question. His hon. and gallant Friend had shown a perfect readiness on the part of the Artillery Company to meet the natural and legitimate wish of the City of London Volunteers to use the drill ground. But, as he understood, this was a question not of policy but of property. His hon. and gallant Friend said that if there were a claim of law it should be pressed in a Court of Law; but, if not, such a claim should be withdrawn, and then the Artillery Company would be perfectly ready to consider whether some satisfactory arrangement might not be made. This being the position taken by the Artillery Company, he appealed to his hon. Friend (Sir John Lubbock) not to persist in a Motion which was really the obstacle to its own success. At all events he, on the part of the Government, could be no party to any invasion of the right of property, or take upon himself to decide any question affecting property.

Mr. CRAWFORD also asked his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) to withdraw his Motion. He thought that the offer of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) was a perfectly fair one, at any rate from his point of view, and he also thought it was to be regretted that this matter had come under the notice of the House, for if the two hon. Gentlemen had met in a room they could have settled it in a short time without any waste of the time of the House.

Mr. MELLY said, he thought his hon. Friend (Sir John Lubbock) and the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) might easily settle the question between them in a manner satisfactory to both sides.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that it was not so easy to deal with the Honourable Artillery Company as his two hon. Friends supposed. It was only after exhausting all other means that the City of London Volunteer Committee requested him to bring the matter before Parliament. He must remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) that, in 1871, the Court of Lieutenancy in a most temperate letter requested that the Volunteers might be allowed the use of this drill ground, but the Artillery Company declined to grant this request. In the following year the Lord Mayor, as chairman of the City of London Volunteer Committee, again requested the Artillery Company to allow the use of the ground when they did not require it, and the request was again declined. It was true the legal claim had been put forward in the letter of the colonels; but while he thought the Volunteers, as the successors of the ancient Trained Bands, had an equitable claim to use this drill ground, he had never advanced any legal claim on their part. It was one thing to deny that the land in question was private property, it was another to assert that the Volunteers had any legal claim. He based his Resolution not on legal rights, but on public policy. However, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would bring the matter before the Honourable Artillery Company, and if Government would give this matter their consideration, he could not but think that an arrangement would be made which would be satisfactory to all parties. As he had to a great extent obtained his object, he would withdraw his Motion.

CENTRAL ASIA.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

Mr. EASTWICK, in rising to call attention to the state of affairs in Central Asia; and to move an Address for Copies of Correspondence relating to the Missions to Khiva of Mr. Thomson and Rajib Ali; and, of any Dispatches in 1862 and 1863 respecting the employment of British Officers with the troops of His Majesty the Shah, and respecting the state of Khurásán at that time, said—

"It is admitted by all that the Central Asiatic question has now reached a stage when any further delay in its settlement is impossible, and at which, in one way or the other, it must be brought to a conclusion."

These were not his words, but the words of General Romanovski, after he had, on the 23rd of December, 1866, resigned the government of Turkestan. On the 20th of May in that year, he had, to use his own expression, annihilated the Army of the Amír of Bukhárá, in the decisive battle of Irjár, taken by storm on the 5th of June following—"That most populous, wealthy, and picturesque city of Central Asia, Khojend," by which he perfectly tranquillized the new Russian Province, which he had thus extended southward to the 40th parallel, and further completely severed by Russian territory the Khanates of Bukhárá and Kokand. Finally, on the 13th and 30th of October in the same year, he took from Bukhárá, with a loss to the enemy of 8,000 men, the strong fortresses of Ouran Tiubé, and Jizákh, by which the whole Valley of the Jaxartes fell into the possession of Russia. Since then, the whole Valley of the Oxus, too, had in like manner been engulfed in the same immense Empire; its limit had been advanced from the 40th to the 38th parallel—that is, having already in 1866 passed in Asia beyond the parallel of Constantinople, it had moved still further southward to that of Sicily and Crete. Russia had thus become continuous with the northern frontier of Persia along its entire length, and with Afghánistán, and had also made strides towards the Great Wall of China. Might we not, then, repeat the words of the victorious Russian general, and echo back to him that any further delay in the settlement of this question was impossible.

In one way or the other it must be brought to a conclusion. It might, however, perhaps be said, that the question was already settled, and that in the Papers in his hands, containing the results of the Granville-Gortchakow negotiation, its settlement was recorded. He was unwilling to disturb the repose of those whose wish was father to this thought, and who, from the happy corners of ignorance and indifference, were, no doubt, weaving, as had so often happened before, economical dreams as to the future impossibility of war, the reduction of our forces, and the transmutation of breech-loaders and bayonets into railway-sleepers and locomotives; but in approaching this question the notions of the careless and superficial were as much to be deprecated as those of the alarmist, and it would be his aim, therefore, to take the middle course and present things as they really were, leaving theory to others while taking his stand on facts. He would begin, then, by remarking that the Central Asian question was not a single, but a many-sided one. It had several aspects distinct from one another, but not unreal or untruthful from the different points of view from which the question was regarded. There were the Russian, the Central Asian, the Anglo-Indian, and the religious aspects. Nor was this all; for some of these had varied much in the course of time, changing with the change of circumstances. Like revolving lights, they became dim, and were even altogether obscured at intervals and then flashed out again into startling brilliance. The change of the beacon, however, must not make us forget even for a moment that the danger was there still, and that we must give due diligence to steer our course so as to avoid it. He would commence with the Russian aspect of the question, and he desired to speak with the utmost diffidence, and to express his regret that it had not fallen to the lot of some one better acquainted with Russia and Russian policy than himself to deal with this part of the question. He had had, indeed, some opportunities of studying it; he had travelled through Caucasia, crossed the Caspian in Russian steamers, in a merchant vessel, and in a man-of-war, and had visited one, at least, of the principal Russian depôts. He had landed at Ashurádh and at Astarádh, and had passed along the whole frontier of Khurásán to that of Hirát. He was, too, for three years in communication with the diplomatists and Consular officers of Russia in those parts; and had done his best to learn something of the history of that grand and interesting Empire. But the little knowledge he had thus gained was only enough to show him the difficulty of predicting the course which might be taken by the Imperial Government towards the rest of Asia, of which immense Continent it already possessed more than a third—more, that was, than 6,000,000 of square miles, having even within the last quarter of a century, acquired there a territory almost half the size of Europe, thus leaving behind the lagging footsteps of our statisticians, and making our gazetteers and encyclopedias out of date. Abandoning, then, attempts at vaticination to those whose profound knowledge was a justification, or whose utter ignorance was an excuse for indulging in them, he would proceed to state facts which it would be difficult to invalidate, and from which hon. Members might draw what inferences they thought best. He would ask, however, for the indulgence of the House if he dwelt long on the history of the question; for, without a connected view of it, it was impossible to come to a right conclusion. The first fact was that Russia was at least as much an Asiatic as she was an European Power. This was a fact which should never be lost sight of in dealing with this question of Central Asia, because it had both a sentimental and a practical bearing upon it, the importance of which could not be overrated. Yet during the last century and a half Russia had exerted so powerful an influence on Europe, and had extended her dominion so far into the very centre of our Continent, that her Asiatic origin and nature were, perhaps, too much forgotten. Of the three races, however, which composed the great Russian people, two, the Ugrian and the Turk, were purely Asiatic; and the other, the Sarmatian, which included the Slavonic, only half European. As for the Varangian or Scandinavian element, it was far too little to leaven the whole lump. But it mattered not what European mixture there was in the Russian nation up to the 13th century, for whatever it was, it then all passed through the Asiatic Mint, and at no more remote date than that of our Henry III. was all, as it were, re-coined when the Mongols conquered Russia and held it for three centuries. The facts of which he would speak, though remote, were germane to the question, and had a most remarkable bearing upon it. With Asiatics, thought was stereotyped, and the invasion of which he was speaking, strange as it might seem to us, had a living influence on the events which were now taking place in Central Asia. The conquests of the Mongol Emperor, Tamugin or Chingiz, were the most stupendous ever achieved by one man, and of the four portions into which his immense empire was divided at his death it was the fact that that which went to the heir of his eldest son was a great part of that Central Asia of which he was speaking, and Russia. This portion, itself an enormous empire, was divided into the four Khanates of Kazan, Astrakhan, the Crimea, and Kipchak, which last comprised Khiya, the Caspian, and perhaps part of Bukhara. Never was there a more iron yoke, or a bondage more complete and ignominious than that imposed by the rulers of these Mongol Khanates on Russia. It lasted till 1480, when the Golden Horde or Camp of Astrakhan was destroyed by the general of Ivan III., the Nogai

Tatars of the Crimea, and the Hetman of the Cossacks; but the struggle was not completely over till 1554, when Ivan the Terrible captured Astrakhan, having two years before taken Kazan. For three centuries, then, the Mongols enslaved Russia, and for the succeeding three centuries Russia had been subjugating the Mongols. The whirligig of time had indeed brought strange revenges, for the successor of those grand princes, who held the horses of Uzbek envoys in the attitude of slaves, was now the Arbiter of the destinies of the whole Uzbek race. If it were allowable to argue from a somewhat parallel case, he might point to the four invasions of Constantinople by the Varangian rulers of Russia, the last of which took place in the 11th century, and the attempts to renew them by the Czarina and Czar of the 18th and 19th. But he should have to return to this matter in order to notice some facts which he imagined would surprise the House, and in the meantime he admitted it to be not improbable that the continued passage of envoys and travellers from other European States through Russia to Persia, India, and China during the Middle Ages might have had an effect in inducing Russia to advance in the same direction for commercial as much as for political reasons. These missions and expeditions began as early as the 9th century, when Alfred the Great sent the Bishop of Shernburg on a pastoral mission to Christian Communities in India across the Caspian and by way of Balkh. From the 13th century the intercourse of Europe with Central Asia through Astrakhan became frequent up to the 16th, when the adoption of the sea route to India caused the more arduous route overland to be wholly disregarded and discontinued. Russia, however, continued to advance, and the more her European dominions were consolidated, the more she extended her power in Asia, and the more portentous grew the shadow she cast over that vast continent. The historical writer, Bell, indeed told them that "Russia that had been Asiatic under the Ruriks, rapidly developed a tendency to become European under the Romanoffs," and he added that after the Treaty with Poland, in 1619, "Russia, so long considered an Asiatic nation, began to take its place among the European States." But facts proved that the advance of Russia in both Continents went on pari passu, and that if in one period an onward stride was made in Europe, the next period saw a corresponding stride in Asia. Thus the acquisition of the provinces of Perm and Viatka at the close of the 15th century, and of Kazan and Astrakhan in the 16th, on the European side of the Ural mountains, was balanced by the submission in 1574 of the Bashkirs, the original inhabitants of the Orenburg territory, and by the annexation of vast tracts in the immense region of Siberia, on the Asiatic side of the Ural range, the conquest of which was commenced and carried a long way by Yermak, the Don Cossack, about that time. The same balance was maintained in the reigns of Peter the Great and Catherine II., and he could not assent to the statement of General Romanovski, that the Asiatic conquests of those Sovereigns were not conducted on any system or preconceived plan. He said nothing of that somewhat apocryphal document, the Czar Peter's will; he only looked at facts. Peter commenced by sending expeditions up the Oxus to Bukhára, and across the Khivan territory, the most famous of which was that of the unfortunate Prince Bekevitch in 1717. The great Czar settled Americans at Astrakhan to carry on the silk trade with Gilán, and a Russian company at Shamákhí, in the heart of the Persian provinces, on the Caspian. He encouraged shipbuilding on the Caspian, and General Perovski admitted that his attention continued to be steadily directed to the regions of Central Asia, to explore which he despatched Beneveni to Bukhára in 1718. Finally, he devoted the latter years of his life to the conquest of Persia. On the 15th of May, 1722, he sailed with 49,000 men to attack the Persian provinces on the west coast of the Caspian, and next year he concluded a Treaty with the envoy of Sháh Támásp, by which Persia ceded to him Darbend and Baku, Dághistán, Shirwán, Gilán, Mazandarán, and Astarábád, on condition of his expelling the Afgháns from Persia, and seating Támásp on the throne. Sir John McNeill had told us that this was a discreditable transaction, and that it was wholly disavowed by the Sháh. Be that as it might, it was certain that Peter was looking only to extending his empire, for he made no attempt to assist Támásp, and no sooner was he dead than a partition Treaty was made on the 8th of July, 1725, between Russia and Turkey, by which Catherine—who was no doubt only carrying out her husband's scheme—was to have all the Caspian provinces, and Turkey all the rest of Western Persia. It was not till 1732 and 1735, after 130,000 Russian soldiers had perished by disease in those provinces, that they were restored to Persia. But, as usual, Russia, while forced to relinquish territory in one quarter was rapidly acquiring it in another. In 1703, Ayuk, the Kalmyk Chief, with great numbers of that tribe, crossed from Central Asia and settled in Russia. In the same year the Khán of Khiva did homage to the Czar as did several of his successors, whence, according to General Perovski, "arises the positive right of Russia to the Khanate of Khiva." In 1732 the Sultán of the Lesser Horde of the Kirghíz Kazzáks swore allegiance to the Empress Anne, as did also the Kára Kalpáks, and about the same time—that was, in 1728—the Treaty of Kiakhtha added that important place to the vast territory which had been acquired in Siberia, and which already extended along the whole breadth of Asia to Behring Straits. At this time, however, a period of trouble and disaster set in for Russia, especially on her south-eastern frontier, which lasted till about 10 years after the accession of Catherine II. The reigns of her rulers were brief, and in some instances disastrous. The Bashkirs rebelled in 1735, and continued in revolt for six years. They rebelled again in 1756, and in 1771 the Kalmyks, 400,000 in number, attempted to escape from Russia and to return to Central Asia; but Russia, rather than lose her hold on this part of the Mongol race, pursued them into the Steppe, where the troops of General Fravenberg and the Kirgiz almost entirely destroyed that vast multitude. In 1773 the rebellion of Pugatschef shook the throne of Catherine, and by it, and the previous revolts, the progress of Russia in Asia was delayed for more than 70 years. But this long struggle only brought out into stronger light the intense tenacity with which Russia holds to her policy of annexation, a policy from which it might be truly said, that—

"Neither heat, nor frost, nor thunder,
Can wholly do away I ween
The marks of that which once hath been."

At the end of 1772 the era of conquest recommenced with the partition of Poland, and two years afterwards the Treaty of Kainarji paved the way to the absorption of the third Mongol Khanate, the Crimea. The close of the 18th century, and of Catherine the Second's reign, saw Russia with her European dominions vastly enlarged preparing for fresh conquests in Central Asia by receiving the submission of the Turkumans, and invading Persia with a formidable Army. From this time to the Crimean War, he passed over the history of Russian wars and annexations, candem semper cantilenam, for they had been sketched by the masterly pen of the author of that famous pamphlet, The Progress of Russia in the East, which had no doubt been read by all who heard him. There were only one or two points in the chronicles of that half century to which he would briefly advert. The first was the agreement between Paul and Napoleon in 1801 for the invasion of India. The invading Army was to consist of 70,000 regular soldiers, Russians and French in equal numbers, and 50,000 Cossacks, and was to be conveyed from Astrakhan to Astarábad—a voyage which took three days now—and march thence to the Indus by way of Hirát, Farah, and Kandahár. Seventy years ago, then, Russia adopted the idea of invading India by way of Hirát, the nearest point of her territory being then at least 1,200 miles from that city. The distance was now barely 400 by way of Khoja Sálíh and Marv. This project of invasion revived with the Treaty of Tilsit in 1807, and re-appeared for the third time during the Crimean War, adding one more proof, were any required, of the fact that an aggressive idea once adopted by Russia was never abandoned. Another instance was the scheme of annexing Khiva attempted by the Cossacks in the 17th century, again determined on and attempted by Peter the Great in 1717, resolved on by Nicholas in 1830, and attempted by him in 1841, disavowed by Alexander II. in 1869, and accomplished by him in 1873. He dwelt for one moment on the preparations made by Nicholas in 1830, because they were the sequel of an aggressive movement so complicated as to be rare even in the history of Russia. On the 21st of February, 1828, Russia hastily concluded the Treaty of Turkumánchái with Persia, by which she annexed a considerable territory, in order to attack Turkey, and having brought that State to the very brink of destruction, at the last moment conceded to her, at the intercession of the other great Powers, another half century, it might be, of existence by the Treaty of Adrianople on the 14th of September, 1829. But no sooner was the Treaty signed, than Nicholas collected troops at Orenburg for the reduction of Khiva, and entered into an agreement with Persia to divide the spoil—an agreement which would have been carried out had not the Russian Army been hurriedly called away to suppress the rebellion which had broken out in Poland. Another passage in this period of history to which he must refer, was what happened with respect to Persia in 1837. In February of that year our Ambassador at St. Petersburg, Lord Durham, remonstrated with Count Nesselrode on the conduct of Count Simonich, the Russian Minister in Persia, in urging Muhammad Shah to advance against Hirát. Count Nesselrode replied that if the Count had acted in the manner stated by Sir John McNeill, he had done that which was in direct opposition to his instructions, and he (Count Nesselrode) entirely agreed with the English Government as to the folly and impolicy of the course pursued by the Shah. Yet at that very time the secret emissary of the Russian Government, Captain Vítcevích, was carrying to Kábul and Kandahár letters from the Emperor, asking the chiefs of those Principalities to connive at the capture of Hirát by the Persians; and shortly after Count Simonich took the command of the Persian troops in the trenches before that city, and a regiment of Russian deserters that just before had been made over to the Count, assisted in the siege and in the assault. But he had no wish to dwell upon these facts. He mentioned them simply because, if he found similar disclaimers in the negotiations which they had to consider to-night, they might have a standard by which to judge them, and might estimate the wisdom of the Government which deemed it to be thoroughly safe to rely upon them. For the rest he desired to speak with respect of a great Power, which had sometimes been our Ally, which had accomplished a great work of civilization in the immense and inhospitable regions of Siberia, where no other European State could penetrate, and which had, at least, one justification for its boundless ambition, and that was unbounded success. He said nothing, then, of secret Articles, such as that of the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, of schemes of annexation so wild as to be almost incredible, such as the designs of Paskievitch on Baghdad, the attempt to purchase Astarábad, not indeed so absurd now, and to acquire Thibet; and he contented himself with summing up this part of the subject in the words of Sir John McNeill, in 1837, that even then Russia had annexed more than half Sweden, as much of Poland as equalled the whole of Austria, and of Turkey in Europe as was equivalent to Prussia, a part of Persia as large as England, and provinces of Turkey in Asia and Tátary co-extensive with the rest of Europe. But he came now to 1854, and he thought that hon. Members who did not know the fact would be astonished to learn that at that time, when one would have imagined that the whole mind of Russia was concentrated on the Crimean War, a committee was actually sitting, of which Count Perovski, then Governor General of Orenburg, and General Hasford, Governor General of Western Siberia, were members, to decide on a plan for connecting a line of forts which ran from Siberia to the base of the Thian Shán mountains with a converging line from Orenburg along the Jaxartes; in other words, upon the occupation of Central Asia. In alluding to this fact, General Romanovski said, with a sang froid which bordered on the sublime, "While accepting this decision, which must have inevitably led one way or another to the subjection of Kokand, Bukhára, and Khiva, the Russian Government was far from entertaining any ambitious views!" The Russians had, in fact, long been preparing for this advance. In 1833 they had built the Mangishlak Fort on Khivan territory, in the north-east corner of the Caspian, and in 1842 they had occupied Ashurá dah belonging to Persia in the opposite extremity. They had erected the Orenburg, Ural, and Kárabulak Forts, in the Orenburg Steppe on the rivers Turgai, Irgíz, and Karábul, and Fort Raimsk, or Aralsk, east of the Aral Sea in 1847, and in 1848 had launched a steam flotilla on that sea. In 1851 they commenced the capture of a line of forts, built from 1817 to 1847 on the banks of the Jaxartes by the Kokandians. They had thrust back the Kirgiz from the Orenburg Steppe, and had spread over it a Cossack population of 239,046 men, women, and children; and, above all, they had established a fortified line of posts in the shape of a crescent, from Guriev, on the Caspian, to Orenburg, Orsk, Troitska, Petropalovski, Semipalátsinsk, and Bakhtarminsk, which extended far up into the Altaí mountains, and over a distance of 2,200 miles. It was from those lines, from the horns of the crescent, that they now proposed to advance a wedge of fortification which would enable them to go forward 1,000 miles, and take up another position at the foot of the mountains of Khurásán. In 1853 they took Ak Musjid, an important fort on the Jaxartes, commanded by Yakúb Beg Kushbegi, now better known as the Atáligh Ghází, the present ruler of Kashgár, who made a heroic defence. Operations were somewhat retarded by the Crimean War and a rebellion of the Kirgiz, but they were never abandoned. In 1854 they founded Fort Vernöe, and occupied the Trans-Ilí region. Vernöe is 800 miles from Petropalovski, that is from their original base of operations, and it became the capital of the Great Horde of the Kirgiz, numbering 118,000 persons, who all became subjects of Russia. In 1858, M. Khanikoff, a distinguished diplomatist and man of science, with eight other savants, was sent on a mission to Hirát, which he thoroughly examined and surveyed. In 1859 Géounfb was taken, and Schamyl sent prisoner to Russia. The Circassian Exodus followed, and the great Army of Caucasasia was set free for fresh conquests. In 1860 General Zimmermann destroyed the forts of Pishpek and Tokmak, belonging to Kokand. Thus, in 1864 the time had arrived for a general advance, so as to effect the junction of the Siberian and Orenburg Lines recommended by the committee of 1854. Accordingly, General Cherniayef, with 2,500 men, moved from the east along the Siberian Lines, and General Verétskin, with 1,500 men, from the west along the Jaxartes Line. On the 6th of June, General Cherniayef, after capturing some smaller places, took from the Kokandians, with a loss to them of 700 killed and wounded, the strong fort of Auliéta, and on the 19th General Verëfkin captured the City of Turkestan, thus effecting a junction between the two lines of advance, and on the 22nd of September the City of Chemkend fell to General Cherniayef. The object the committee of 1854 had in view was thus accomplished, and Russia had attained a position in Central Asia which enabled her to control the Uzbek States. It was unnecessary to advance further, and she determined to affect a virtue of moderation if she had it not. Accordingly, on the 21st of November, 1864, Prince Gortchakow addressed a Circular Despatch to the Representatives of Russia at foreign Courts, declaring that the town of Chemkend "fixed for the Russians with geographical precision the limit up to which they were bound to advance, and at which they must halt." But the ink of this remarkable document was no sooner dry than their conquests recommenced. In fact, the Russian advance was never suspended at all, not even at the time when Prince Gortchakow was penning this admirable despatch, which was a model of diplomatic writing, and which pointed out with much eloquence and no little truth, how it had been the fate of every country that had barbarous neighbours—the United States in America, France in Algeria, Holland in her Colonies, England in India—to be irresistibly forced "less by ambition than by imperious necessity" to an onward march of conquest, "where the greatest difficulty was to know when to stop." It was desirable to appease the jealousy of England, and, perhaps, of France and Germany, and a despatch cost a Russian diplomatist so little, hence this Circular; but the Government of the Czar had clearly no real intention of pausing in their career of conquest, and they had none now. From that day to this the Russians had been ceaselessly advancing, not in Central Asia only, but along the whole line, as he would show. Chemkend fell on the 22nd of September, and on the 27th General Cherniayef advanced 70 miles to the south against Tashkend. It was a city of 100,000 inhabitants, but he hoped to carry it by a coup-de-main. He was repulsed, with the loss of 16 killed and 64 wounded; but he had only 1,550 men, and the wonder was that with so small a force he should have ventured to attack so great a city in the midst of a hostile population of 500,000. On the 4th of December the Kokandians, encouraged by this success, attacked, under Alim Kul, their ruler, the station of Chilik, between Chemkend and Turkestan, in immense force. A detachment of 100 Ural Cossacks, sent from Turkestan with a howitzer to relieve Chilik, were here almost destroyed, losing 5 officers and 52 men killed, and 2 officers and 41 men wounded. Yet they defended themselves for three days against a whole army, until relieved by a force from Turkestan. Few more gallant actions were ever fought, and he mentioned it in order to show what sort of troops those Ural Cossacks and the advancing columns of the Russians were. On the 12th of February, 1865, the newly-acquired territories of the Russians were, by an Imperial Ordinance, erected into the province of Turkestan, which was at first made subordinate to Orenburg. General Cherniayef was appointed Governor and Commander-in-Chief, but the Government of the Czar refused to sanction his project of annexing Tashkend; but, it was added, "took care to supply him, without loss of time, with means for a strong defence;" in other words, gave him 15,000 men, and threw on him the responsibility of advancing. This he was quite willing to accept, and on the 29th of April he took the strong fort of Niyazbek, 15 miles north-east of Tashkend, and commanding its water supply; and on the 7th of May he took up a position against Tashkend itself, repulsing on the 9th a sortie of 7,000 men, and killing Alim Kul, the ruler of Kokand, who led it. Tashkend fell on the 15th of June, and reinforcements were immediately sent from Orenburg and the Volga, but were long in arriving. Meantime, in October, General Cherniayef sent an embassy to the Amír of Bukhára, "who had the audacity to detain it;" whereupon General Cherniayef made an unsuccessful reconnaissance in the territory of Bukhára, and was, consequently, in January, 1866, replaced by General Romanovski, who requested that he might not be hampered by formalities, and reaching Tashkend on the 25th of March went to work at once. On the 22nd of April the first steamer with reinforcements arrived from Fort Perovski on the Jaxartes, and soon after came another, proving that the Jaxartes was navigable, and that the stories to the contrary were fabrications meant to blind us. On the 20th of May was fought the decisive battle of Irjár, to which he had already alluded. The Amír of Bukhárá was utterly routed, with the loss of all his baggage, guns, and ammunition, and at least 1,000 men killed, while the Russians had only 12 men wounded. The cities of Náu, Khojend, and Ouran-Tiube—all important places, situate 80, 70, and 100 miles to the south of Tashkend—fell on the 26th of May, the 5th of June, and the 13th of October. In the last place the Russians lost only 17 killed and 210 wounded, and acknowledged to have themselves buried 2,000 of the enemy; while the Bukharians put their loss at 15,000 killed and wounded. On the 30th of October, Jizákh, in the territory of Bukhárá, 90 miles west of Khojend, was stormed, and 53 guns taken. The Russians had 6 killed and 92 wounded, while the Bukharians had 6,000 killed. General Romanovski was relieved at the end of 1866 by General Kauffmann, who was said to be one of the ablest officers in the Russian service, and the only one not to be tempted into fresh annexations. However, on the 14th of May, 1868, he, too, advanced, and captured on that day Samarkand, the city of Timúr, which he entered at the head of a brilliant staff, among whom was the Afghán Prince, Iskandar Khán. The gallantry of the Russian soldiers had been beyond praise; but the circumstance most important to us, and the only one to which he would call attention, was that after that battle a corps of Afghán refugees, 300 strong, which had been with the Amír of Bukhárá, came over to the Russians, and were now in their service, commanded by Iskandar Khán, son of Sultán Ján, the ruler of Hirát, and the murderer of Sir William Macnaghten. It was only natural that these events should have attracted the notice of the Viceroy of India and of Ministers in this country, but he did not see why there should have been any mystery about the course intended to be taken. Nevertheless, mystery there was, and when in the Session of 1869 he proposed to call attention to the subject, he was twice requested by the Prime Minister to postpone—pending negotiations—the Motion, which he was not enabled to make till the 9th of July in that year. Those negotiations were before the House, and he would say at once that he did not see why they should have been kept secret; nor, secondly, why they were entered into at all. He was always alarmed when we began to negotiate; because we had an unlucky habit of meaning what we said, and of intending to be bound by it, but yet of expressing ourselves in such a way that those with whom we negotiated thought we meant something else. Besides, if, as was here stated, we had perfect confidence in our own strength, and dreaded nothing from the advance of Russia, but yet thought that the States with which we had relations should not be encroached upon—as Persia, Afghánistán, and Kashgár—would it not have been more dignified to have simply intimated to Russia that we should regard an advance beyond a certain parallel—for instance, the parallel of Samarkand, as an unfriendly act, which would necessitate our adopting such measures as we might deem expedient. He believed that our wishes would have been complied with; for, independently of the friendly feeling which he hoped existed between the two countries, Russia would hardly choose this moment, he imagined, for dissension, when she had Central Asia to settle, and was reorganizing her Army, in which 40 to 60 per cent of the superior officers were Germans, while there was a great deficiency of officers generally—1,300 doctors alone, it was said, being wanting. Negotiations, however, there were; and he regretted that it would be his duty to show that during the whole time they were carried on, the Russians, while affecting to yield to the remonstrances first of Lord Clarendon, and then of Lord Granville, were incessantly advancing, and adding fresh annexations to those which already formed the subject of complaint. For instance, on September the 3rd, 1869, Prince Gortchakow told Lord Clarendon, at Heidelberg, that it was the intention of the Emperor not to retain Samarkand; and on the 26th of February, 1870, General Milhutine, the Russian Minister of War, said to Sir Andrew Buchanan that he still hoped that the occupation of that city would not be permanent. But at that very time, according to the Russian Review, General Abramow was sent with an expedition to the Iskandar Kul Lake, which lies 50 miles to the south-east of Samarkand, and to the districts of Faráb, Mágián, and Kishtúd, which, he believed, lay to the east of the Lake, and also to Falgar and Fán, dependencies at one time of Hisár, at another of Ura-tepe, as well as to Mátcha and Yaghnan, which belonged to Karátégín, a chiefdom at a very considerable distance to the south-east of Samarkand. General Abramow deposed the chiefs of those places, united Faráb, Mágián, and Kishtúd to his own government, and told the people of Falgar, Fán, Mátcha, and Yaghnan that they would be free from taxation till the end of 1870, after which they must send to Samarkand 1 rouble and 20 kopecks for each farm, as henceforth they were to consider themselves subjects of Russia, and neither Kokand nor Karátégín would have any claim upon them. In short, instead of Samarkand being relinquished, the country surrounding it had been annexed to Russia, and the city itself had the strongest garrison in Turkestan—four out of the 12 frontier battalions being stationed there, and at its outpost Katta-Kungán. But Bukhárá itself was virtually annexed to Russia, for Abdu 'l Fath Mirza, the youngest son of the Amir, went to St. Petersburg on the 3rd of November, 1869, to do homage to the Emperor, and to petition for the succession. What did that mean? We knew what it meant in the case of Heraclius of Georgia, and of so many other Princes who had submitted to Russia, and we might guess the result as regards the young Prince of Bukhárá. But the next year to that of General Abramow's expedition saw another important annexation, of which little, if any, notice had been taken in this country—that of Zungaria. Chevang, the ruler of this country in 1700, was the rival of the Emperor of China. He ruled from Lake Balkash, in latitude 47 degrees, over all the territories now held by the Atáligh Gházi, and over Thibet, and, according to General Perovski, over Bukhárá also. He demanded the daughter of the Emperor of China in marriage, and on being refused, maintained an equal war with China for years. It was not till 1721 that the Emperor Kanghi was able to expel him from Thibet, and not before 1759, long after his death, that the Chinese conquered Zungaria. He mentioned these facts to show the importance of this country. The capital—Kulja—was annexed by the Russians in July, 1871, and they thus recovered the sovereignty over the Kalmyk nation, who had migrated to Russia in 1703, and returned to Zungaria in 1771. The Russian frontier was thus extended 200 miles to the south, and made continuous with that of Kashgúr, along its entire length. Last year another advance was made by the Russians still further to the east. They marched from Kiakhta 200 miles to the south, and took possession of Ourga with 2,000 men. This town was in Mongolia, and it was alleged that it was occupied because the Dungans, the Muhammadan rebels of China, would have seized it and impeded the trade. Be that as it might, it was certain that the whole of Mongolia was ready to submit to Russia, and that would carry the Russian frontier to the Great Wall of China. Meantime a caravan with a formidable military escort had traversed the country between Zungaria and Ourga, which seemed to forbode annexation. In the extreme east, in the province of Amurskaya, there was the same activity on the part of the Russians. He was informed that a line of steamers was to run from Nicolaiev to Hankow in the centre of China, but he would rather leave it to others to speak of what was going on in that quarter. But there was one most remarkable circumstance that he must bring to the notice of the House, which he was told had been reported by our Consul at Newchang. He said that he had fallen in with several parties of Russians exploring in Manchúria who gave out that they were digging up landmarks which showed that those regions belonged to Russia in bygone ages. This could only mean that they pretended to have found the landmarks of the Mongols, whose successors they were, and whose original country they possessed, as, for instance, the Great Forest, near the Onon River, in which Chingiz was born, and where Gibbon told us he held his Court and used to settle the tribute of the Grand Princes of Russia, the Kháns of Central Asia, the Kings of Iconium, Persia, and other intermediate countries. He had commenced by saying that Russia was at least as much an Asiatic as she was a European Power, and the long array of facts he had cited showed that in nothing was she more Asiatic than in that insatiable desire of annexing new territory, which was so pre-eminently the characteristic of Asiatic rulers. To her the Central Asian question then was evidently one of aggrandizement, and when he said he found it difficult to predict her course of action he did not mean to express a doubt of her ambition but only of the way in which it would be manifested. He had shown that the progress of Russia since the Crimean War had been enormous, but her present preparations proved that she was now meditating something even greater. In Poland she had made and was making herself strong against Germany and Austria in the almost impregnable quadrilateral of Modlin, Czenstochowa, Ivangorod, and Brzese Litewski, the entire garrison of which in time of war would probably exceed our whole regular Army. There were, it was said, 80,000 men in Modlin alone. She was planning and completing railroads, one from the Don to Petrovsk on the Caspian, three from Central Russian cities to the Volga, which would enable her to throw a large army into Central Asia at any moment. She intended to re-fortify Sevastopol, and was sending circular iron-clads down to Taganrog and Kertch. She had torn up the Treaty of Paris, and was re-organizing her Army on the principle of compulsory service for all classes which would enable her to draw 2,100,000 regular soldiers from the 4,000,000 of men she had at the age for conscription. In seven years—in ten at the farthest—she would have that stupendous Army in the field. The time might then be propitious. Germany and France might then be fighting out their deadly quarrel. Turkey, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were a true prophet, would then be bankrupt, and Russia firmly posted at Marv and Híráť would demand of fortune one of her two long-coveted prizes, and would receive for answer, Utrum mavis accipe. He must now for one moment look at the question as Central Asiatics themselves regarded it. He was no defender of the slave trade. No man had denounced it in stronger terms than he, and he believed that had his advice, offered ten years ago, been taken, it would have half died out in Central Asia. His despatches showed how the occupation of Marv and Híráť by Persia would affect that trade, and he regretted that the Government should have thought it right to refuse to lay his despatches on the Table. He abhorred slavery, but was bound to acknowledge that it was a Muhammadan institution, sanctioned by the laws and the religion of Islám. What was happening in Zanzibar sufficiently proved that fact. He was bound, too, to say that the Turkumans and not the Uzbeks were responsible for the murders and other atrocities which marked the slave trade in Central Asia, and the Uzbeks had no power to control the Turkumans. So far from that, the Turkumans murdered one of the Kháns of Khiva in Khiva itself, and the city swam in blood, for 12,000 of them were murdered in return. They sent the head of another Khán to the present Shah of Persia, who, with true magnanimity, buried it and built a mosque over it, though it was the head of an enemy. Even if the Uzbeks had not bought slaves, the Turkumans would have captured men for their own service. The Uzbeks treated their slaves well, allowed them to save up money to purchase their freedom, and granted them some singular privileges. It must be remembered, too, that there had been, and still were, things, which might have induced the Uzbeks to think that those who complained of their keeping slaves were not, after all, much more immauculate than themselves in the matter. It was not so long since Russia emancipated her serfs. Captain Abbott related that the Persian Ambassador to Khiva of his time purchased in Khiva two beautiful women for slaves, who were released by the Khán himself. Our own Native Agent, Rajib Ali, who was sent to Khiva from Tehrán about 1858, purchased a number of girls of good station, who were sold with their families by the Khán's order for some political disturbance. Rajib Ali brought those females to Tehrán and sold them there. The Persians had slaves, the Afgháns had slaves, and even our own Afghán protégés, living under the very eye of our Mission at Tehrán, and paid from the Mission Treasury, they, too, had slaves. But he did not seek to acquit Khiva. No doubt before the Russian invasion she was guilty. He only said that the charges brought against her since then were unfair, and would not be endorsed by any native of Central Asia. He held in his hand the Russian Manifesto containing those charges, but it omitted all mention of the aggressive acts committed by Russia against Khiva during a century and a half, and was inconsistent with the statements of the Russian generals themselves. In 1864, when the Amir of Bukhárá proclaimed a holy war against Russia, and invited Khiva to join in it, Khiva refused. This was admitted by General Romanovski, who said—

"The rumoured participation of Khiva in a war against us was not very credible. That Khanate appreciated too highly the profits of a trade, which had greatly increased; and, moreover, Khiva looked upon Bukhárá with distrust."

So long back as 1854 the same author told us—

"Our relations with Khiva improved after the establishment of the Sir Darya line and the Aral flotilla. They became noticeably less hostile."

The Manifesto accused the Khán of Khiva of encouraging the Kirgiz to revolt, and of sending in 1869 and 1870 plundering bands into the Orenburg Steppe; but where was the proof? In the meantime we must remember that the Russians erected a fort on Khivan territory, in Krasnovodsk Bay, in 1869, and from that time to this had been occupying other parts of Khiva and sending military expeditions through the land. Yet the Khán had done his best to obtain peace. He had sent two Embassies—one to Caucasasia and one to St. Petersburg—to solicit terms, both of which had been repulsed. If no embassy had yet been sent to General Kauffmann, it was obviously because no mercy was expected in that quarter. But whatever the shortcomings of Khiva might have been, we, at least, had no cause for complaint. We commenced diplomatic intercourse with Khiva by sending a Native Envoy from Hirát in 1839. He was graciously received, and a return mission was sent. Captain Abbott was next deputed to Khiva to obtain the release of Russian prisoners, and was most hospitably received and entertained by the Khán, who, to oblige him, and out of compliment to the Queen, released a number of Hirát ladies and a Persian servant of the Tehrán Mission. He also wrote to the Amir of Bukhárá, interceding for Conolly and Stodhart, and in spite of the disastrous failure of Perovski's expedition against him, set free and sent to Russia, under the charge of Sir Richmond Shakespeare, all the Russian prisoners he had, 416 in number. Abbott styled him the just, kind and honorable Khán Hazrat, and said that he loved and respected his character. Sir Richmond Shakespeare, too, spoke well of him, and he thought it much to be regretted that General Perovski should have represented his character so differently, and should have accused the British officers of coming there "for the purpose of making a survey of the Caspian and of the Russian fortresses," and of wishing to take credit for the release of the Russian prisoners, "which was really due to the Russian cornet Aitoff." But some years after, Mr. Thomson was sent from Tehrán to Khiva, and was well received, as was our unworthy agent, Rajib Ali, and the present Khán had sent Envoys to Calcutta, so that from first to last our relations with Khiva have been most friendly, and so would it have been with Russia had her intentions been equally above suspicion. But the fact was that the Chiefs of Central Asia looked upon Russia as an Asiatic Power like themselves, and they knew that her policy, like their own, was one of encroachment and annexation. This idea impelled them to a double course of action which was not so inconsistent as it would appear at first sight. On the one hand, they regarded Russia with dread, and stubbornly opposed her advance. On the other hand, they thought her success fated, and sullenly acquiesced in her triumph, because they thought she was one of themselves. This was not theory, but fact, as he had heard again and again from the lips of Central Asiatics themselves, and it accounted for the voluntary submission of so many wild tribes to Russia. He came now to consider our own view of the question, and certainly not one had varied so much in the course of years. At a time when Russia was separated from India by the vast and apparently impassable desert of Central Asia, we "went to meet that which we would most avoid," we crossed the Indus and advanced to Kábul and Hirát to set up by war a barrier against war. There were fatal errors in that movement. We chose a cruel and licentious tyrant, of whose evil deeds he knew some which had never been chronicled, to be the ruler of Kábul, in place of the ablest and best Afghan chief of whom there was any record, and we made arrangements at Kábul, and, indeed, at every station we occupied, except Kandahár, so extravagantly bad as must have ruined any cause. We did other things which stirred up the fury of the Afgháns against us. He might tell the House that, being in charge of a district at the foot of the Bolán, at that period many Afgháns came to see him as they passed through and told him of these things, and said if the Russians came they would have vengeance for them; and yet like things had been done since in Persia. It was doubtful, too, whether anything could have justified our sending an army so far from its base of operations with the independent countries of Sindh and the Panjab intervening between it and the British India of that day. He believed Lord Hardinge told an officer of high rank that in his judgment our Empire in India trembled in the balance during the Sikh War. He asked, could anyone now think without dismay of what would have happened if the splendid Army of the Sikhs had risen against us when so large a part of our forces was cooped up in Afghánistán? Yet, in spite of all this, he must say our danger was chiefly of our own making, and he believed that had we been prudent we might have carried out our enterprise, rash as it was, without disaster. He said now as he had said then, that had we placed Shah Shuja on the throne and then retired upon Kandahár and Hirát we should have remained masters of the situation. The Afgháns could never have dislodged us from those places, and Shah Shuja, unsurrounded by the hated Firingis, would have made a better fight in his own savage ruthless way than with our aid; and had he fallen, Dost Muhammad, after the severe lesson we had taught him, would have been only too glad to accept our terms. Even as it was, our expedition, though rash in its conception, miserably mismanaged in execution, and fraught with disastrous consequences, was not altogether without results to be carried to the credit side of the account. It taught our Indian Army, then in a lethargic state, something of war on a grand scale, made us acquainted with our present north-west frontier and with the countries beyond, and dispelled for ever the bugbear of an Afghán invasion. But whatever our mistakes might have been at the time of the Afghán War, he believed that we were now falling into errors equally pernicious. At least, we had then a policy, now we had, so far as he knew, none at all. Perhaps, indeed, he should be told that drifting, waiting on Providence, with our hands in our pockets, and a "rest and be thankful" look was a policy. But, at all events, he hoped no one would say that the negotiations recorded in those pages with their lengthened sweetness long drawn out, their babbling of neutral zones and imaginary spheres of influence, represented a policy. We had heard of neutral zones before, and we knew what came of them. By the Treaty of the 18th of September, 1739, the territory round Azov was then evacuated and turned into a neutral zone between Turkey and Russia, and Kabardia was to be another zone, but in the next war the neutral zone was, from its dismantled state, the first place taken, and was forthwith incorporated with Russia. Besides, it was not every country that could be made a neutral zone, and to talk of Afghánistán as a neutral zone seemed like asking an Irishman to sit quietly between two combatants. It was true, however, that Lord Clarendon spoke, not of a neutral zone in his first letter, but of "some territory as neutral between the possessions of England and Russia, which should be the limit of those possessions, and be scrupulously respected by both Powers," and the suggestion that Afghánistán should be the zone seemed to come from Prince Gortchakow rather than from him, the Prince giving a positive assurance that the Emperor looked upon that country "as completely outside the sphere within which Russia may be called upon to exercise her influence." This view was confirmed at page 4, where it was distinctly stated that the "proposal was made by Prince Gortchakow." But the fact that Lord Clarendon was "not sufficiently informed," "at once to express an opinion as to whether Afghánistán would fulfil the conditions and circumstances of a neutral territory between the two Powers," was quite sufficient evidence to prove how incompetent the Foreign Office was to deal with these questions which affect India directly, and this country only on account of India. He passed over the sang froid of the Russian Prince in assuming that all the territory between the Russian outposts and the frontier of Afghánistán was, as a matter of course, to go to Russia, as, for instance, Karategin, Hisar, and other districts where no Russian had yet shown his face, while we were to be absolutely restricted to what we already possessed; but did not Lord Clarendon remember that we had relations with Afghanistan quite inconsistent with making it a neutral territory; that, for instance, we had just been sending up rifled guns and money to Shir Ali to enable him to triumph over his rivals, that the Treaty of Paris might at any time compel us in the interests of Persia, if not our own, to interfere with Afghanistan, that we were constantly obliged to march men into the mountains bordering on Peshawar, and that to declare that region neutral would be to hand over our troops to slaughter and our officers to assassination. Luckily the Council of India and Lord Mayo knew more about the matter, and it was owing to their determined opposition that we were not caught in this snare. So at page 4 they would find Lord Clarendon, on the 17th of April, hurriedly retreating from the suggested neutrality of Afghanistan, and proposing that the Upper Oxus should be the boundary line which neither Power should permit their forces to cross; but Prince Gortchakow immediately conjured up the phantom of Bukhara, that could not raise a finger to save her own lifeless body, to combat this proposition. The end was that the neutral zone seemed, as far as England was concerned, to vanish into thin air, and that, seen through the mirage of Russian misrepresentation, it was still Afghanistan. He was really afraid to touch the Papers at all for fear of brushing away some diplomatic cobweb or other. But he would go back for a moment to the discussion about the relinquishment of Samarkand—that Samarkand which gave Russia the virtual possession of Bukhara, because Bukhara depended on it for its supply of water. He had already shown the utterly illusory character of the pledge of relinquishment as proved by the annexation and taxation of districts still farther to the south, but he could not help adding that it was diametrically opposed to the language held by the Russian governors and generals in Central Asia. As soon as we got clear of the honeyed talk of diplomacy and emerged into the region of common sense, we soon found out what the Russians really meant.

"No instance," said Vambéry, "has yet been known of the Russians ever retracing their steps in any part of Asia." In strict accordance with that statement was the language of Count Perovski's proclamation on entering Central Asia. "The Russians have come here not for a day, nor yet for a year, but for ever!" That was intelligible enough; it was downright plain speaking. Again, Romanovski says—"But the experience of the last years had convinced us that, after occupying any point in Central Asia, it was impossible for us to abandon it." The fact was we had no right to ask Russia to give up Samarkand, no more than Russia had to ask us to give up Peshawar, and she had no more idea of complying than we should have, or rather infinitely less. Let them, then, put away for ever the idle notion that Russia meant to go back, and the no less delusive one that she would become weaker as she advanced. Those notions would delude only the ignorant. In a year or two Central Asia would be Russia—as much Russia as the Crimea or Astrakhan—more so, perhaps, for the exceeding richness of the soil along the Jaxartes, and in the Oasis of Khiva, would bring in a flood of Russian colonists from the starved surplus population of the far north. If anyone would look at page 118 of General Romanovski's pamphlet, he would see that there were 440,036 Cossacks of both sexes in the Ural, Orenburg, and Siberia, and 239,446 in Orenburg alone. These were the Russian pioneers, and could all be pushed to the front. There were already Russian schools, clubs, churches, and newspapers in the cities of the Uzbeks, and brigades of Cossacks had preceded them. The steam power that Russia had in the Caspian and the Volga was more than five times what she had on the Baltic. She had on the Caspian 423 steamers with 33,725 horse-power, and if the Oxus should really be turned into its old course it would be but a fortnight's voyage from Nijni to Khojend. For Central Asia, then, they might read Russia in future. There were one or two other things in these Papers to which he must refer. The first was the contradictory way in which the conduct of the Russian generals was spoken of to suit the occasion. Lord Clarendon was told to be under no apprehension that Russian generals would communicate with Indian malcontents, because "Russian generals are well disciplined;" but at page 9 Prince Gortchakow himself admitted to Lord Clarendon that "the military commanders had all exceeded their instructions in the hope of gaining distinction, and consequently one after the other had been recalled," and in the serious and to us critical matter of the integrity of the Atáligh Gházi's dominions, there was a strange admission "that two Russian officers, with a few followers, did penetrate, not long ago, into Kashgár territory, but contrary to orders"—as if any Russian officer would go without permission from his general—"and so as to draw upon the officers concerned the displeasure of the Russian Government." Now, considering that Captain Valikanoff, the aide-de-camp of the Governor General of Siberia, had in 1858 been to Kashgár, had spent 11 months and 15 days in the journey and residence there, and had made an elaborate Report which he (Mr. Eastwick) had himself read, it was not easy to understand why a fresh expedition should have so recently gone into Kashgár territory, more particularly as it appeared from Mr. Shaw's letter, at page 17 of the Papers, that the Atáligh Gházi was painfully jealous about the Russian encroachments, and spoke very bitterly regarding them. But in reality this pretended disobedience of Russian officers had become too transparent a device. If Russian generals were to deal with their instructions on the frontiers of Persia and Afghánistán as they had dealt with them in Bukhárá, the sooner we increased our Estimates the better. For his part, he could not understand an English Minister enduring to be told that the friendship of this country was so slight a matter that the generals of Russia one after another would risk a rupture with it in order to obtain a cross or a riband. Had we fallen so low that our peaceful relations were made to depend on General Kauffmann's being satisfied with the number of orders he had obtained? The second point was the gathering of Afghán malcontents of the highest rank and influence in Bukhárá, on the frontier of Afghánistán. A parade was made of the Russian Minister at Tehrán being instructed to refuse protection to an Afghán there, of whom we were told next to nothing. But of what consequence was that to us compared with taking into the Russian service a whole corps of Afgháns, commanded by the son of the late ruler of Hírát, who killed Sir William Macnaghten; or of what moment was it when placed beside the residence on the frontier, under Russian protection, of the Sardár Abdarrahmán Khán, the grandson of Dost Muhammed, and the vanquisher and dethroner of Shir Ali? It was true that he had married the daughter of the Amír of Bukhárá, and that that was some excuse for his residing in the territory of his father-in-law, but it was with the aid of that father-in-law and with his troops that he invaded Afghánistán in July, 1865, gathered adherents, and entered Kábul on the 2nd of March, 1866, and defeated Shir Ali in the bloody and for the time decisive battle of Sháhábád. With the consent of Russia, what he then did might be repeated, and at page 40 he found the Sardár actually proposing this to General Kauffmann. It depended, then, on the will of the Russian general whether Afghánistán should or should not be enveloped in the flames of war, and to his mind it was clear that, as these Afghán Sardárs must be interned somewhere, it would better be in our territory, where we had the power to keep them in check without placing ourselves under an obligation to Russia—an obligation probably discussed in every bazár from Samarkand to Delhi. The last thing he would mention was the now palpable absurdity of making the whole negotiations hinge on our restraining Kábul, and Russia keeping back Bukhárá—poor, helpless Bukhárá—while all the time the real danger lay at the south-eastern corner of the Caspian and along the frontier of Khurásán, a well-watered and well-inhabited country, where we had absolutely no means of knowing what went on. In his speech of the 9th of July, 1869, he pointed out that if we had cause for apprehension it was not at Kábul, but at Astarábád, Marv, and Hírát. He said that a Russian expeditionary force might with ease and almost without the knowledge of the Persian Government, be landed at Astarábád and marched along the Perso-Turkuman frontier all the way to Hírát. He had just received a letter from Khurásán which said that that was being done now. He believed that to be exaggeration, but it showed what was expected, and he thought it would not be denied that Russian troops had entered the Persian district of Gurgán in pursuit of some Turkumans, and that they had received the submission of some of the Turkuman tribes who owed allegiance to Persia. No man with any pretensions to a knowledge of strategy could overlook the danger to India that this concentration of force at Ashurá dah and Chikishlar implied. It was idle to call it a movement against Khiva which could be reached from the Aral, from Bukhárá, and from Mangishlak by much shorter routes. It would be ludicrous, if it did not involve such serious issues, to see our Foreign Minister struggling to keep Afghánistán safe—that Afghánistán that knew so well how to protect itself. By warning back the Russians from crossing the fearful Valley of the Upper Oxus, in which Wood told us whole caravans were buried in a single avalanche—from crossing it, he said, in order to get into that hornet's nest of the Afgháns by scrambling up the stupendous slope of the Hindu Kush, where an English sailor, Wood himself, could only crawl on his hand and knees, and with the help of the nimble mountaineers, who, with much greater ease than they dragged him up, could have pitched him like a stone into the abyss beneath, while all the time the Caspian Gates, the front door of India, stood wide open, the Russians clustering on the Steppes, and not a detective in sight. He was not alarmed at the Russian advance, though he quite appreciated its importance. It meant, of course, the downfall of the Turk and of the Turkish religion, which, buoyed up in one quarter, now sank at the fountain-head. It meant danger to India if we were resolved to throw away our vantage and to let persons who had no practical knowledge of the subject, and who delighted in official darkness, guide our counsels. It meant peace and good will and a neighbourly rivalry in commerce with Russia, if we acted with the strength we really possessed, threw overboard all secret diplomacy, came out manfully, and insisted on everything between Russia and ourselves being done in the light of day. If, for instance, we were to have negotiations, let them be before a Congress of the Great Powers; but, above all things, let us not live in a fool's paradise and despise the resources of others while we magnified our own. The immense population of India was not so great a security to us as the waterless deserts and scantily-inhabited plains of Central Asia were to Russia. On the contrary, a teeming and discontented population was a serious danger. Our real strength lay in our fair Government, our English Army, and our wealth; for in the East the sword was his who would pay. It was a real strength and a sufficient one, but then we must not throw away our friends, and must spend our money wisely. We must not neglect the commonest precautions, dig impracticable tunnels at Atak, while it took a week to ferry over a cavalry regiment because there were but few boats, and these altogether unsuited for the purpose. Pesháwar should be strong, and civilians said it was; but the best general we ever had there, Sir Sydney Cotton, said it was weak, and if we wished it to be strong we had much to do. We must begin by making Pesháwar a military government, giving the general the power to deal with offenders. Some thought we should have a suspension bridge across the Indus; but, at all events, we should have some means of crossing it all seasons, and railways to Atak from Lahore and Kará chí, an earthwork at Pesháwar, and our European regiments in healthy cantonments, such as Campbell-pur, with the means of placing them, if requisite, instantaneously at Pesháwar, and we should clear, once for all, the Hills of the robbers, and sweep away the Akhund of Swát, and his followers, the Hindustani rebels and the fanatical assassins. There were other things he might mention, such as the occupation of Quettah, and the maintenance of an Envoy at Hírá t. Quettah was in Kelat, and Kelat was to all intents and purposes India, and the sooner we declared it to be so the better. If our generals said it was wise in a military point of view, then there should be a garrison at Quettah, there should be no weak truckling to the Afgháns in a matter of our Treaty rights with which they had no concern, and a garrison we should have there. He had seen a letter from a great Afghán chief which made him think there would be no objection, but the reverse, to our occupying Quettah; and, as for the Bilúchís, it ought to be known that during the Indian Mutiny Sir Henry Green put himself at the head of 12,000 of them, marched to Káhan without any British troops, and recovered the three guns we had lost at Nafushk. Such were the officers we had had and might have on the frontier, and they were the proper persons to advise whether Quettah should be occupied or not, and to them he left the question. But that was a smaller matter than our alliances with Persia and Kashgár, particularly Persia. Kashgár was, he hoped, provided for by the mission of Mr. Forsyth and the personal character of the Atáligh Ghází. As to Persia, he could say much; but there was no time for it now. One thing, however, he would say, and it was that our interests there had been sacrificed for the last 10 years. Why, for instance, when His Majesty the Shah directed him (Mr. Eastwick) to apply to his Government for British officers to instruct his troops, was that request disregarded? Why was the despatch asking for those officers withheld? He asked that his despatch on the subject might be laid on the Table. He was sorry to hear the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the debate last year pass an eulogium which was not deserved. He had too much respect for the noble Lord to doubt the sincerity with which he spoke, but he dared say they would hear contrary opinions expressed, if not there, then in "another place." But he trusted he should have some other opportunity of dealing with that matter as regarded Persia, and he would now content himself with expressing a hope that in future if we made friends of our enemies, as we had done in the case of Sultán Ján, of Shir Ali, and the Afgháns generally, we should at least not make enemies of our friends, as we did with the Sardár Abdu'r-rahmán Khán, and with Persia in too many instances. Lastly, we should have as little secret diplomacy as possible, and he trusted that in this respect the Government would at once make a change by granting the Papers for which he now asked. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for the Address.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, That She will be graciously pleased to give directions, that there be laid before this House Copies of Correspondence relating to the Missions to Khiva of Mr. Thomson and Rajib Ali:

Mr. Eastwick

"And, of any Despatches in 1862 and 1863 respecting the employment of British Officers with the troops of His Majesty the Shah, and respecting the state of Khurásán at that time."
(Mr. Eastwick.)

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he recalled the remark of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) when this question was brought before the House in 1869 that of all things the most to be deprecated was a policy of mystery. Yet he found that Lord Granville in a despatch to Prince Gortchakoff urged upon him the necessity of coming to a decision at an early date, in order that the question might not be complicated by possible discussions in the British Parliament. He regretted that a Member of the Government which he supported should show such a dread of discussion in regard to a subject which vitally affected the interests of this country. He could not see any reason for the extreme alarm and excitement which took possession of the public mind last autumn on the subject of the Russian advance in Central Asia. The general conclusion arrived at in 1869, when his hon. Friend (Mr. Eastwick) brought forward this question, was that there was no ground for uneasiness. The position had not materially changed since that time, and high authorities had long ago regarded the Russian advance to the Oxus as inevitable. He had no doubt that the Russian Government were perfectly sincere in their desire for no further extension of territory, as sincere as our East Indian Company were when they even censured their Governors for extending it. Khiva was 500 miles west of Samarcand, and consequently so much further from India; and he did not see that the occupation of Khiva would give Russia any advantage against Persia which she did not now fully possess in the island of Ashourada in the south-eastern angle of the Caspian. There was great force in the Russian argument that any further enlargement of their territories depended less on themselves than on the conduct of the native tribes. He did not believe that Russia could avoid advancing her boundaries in Central Asia. Like ourselves in India, she must take more in order to keep what she had got. Did anybody suppose that if we had gone on the principle of confining ourselves to

Bengal we should now be in India at all? He protested against the notion that the people of Central Asia should be denied the benefits of good government because we might think it our interest to have barbarous tribes rather than a civilized nation for our neighbour. History presented no example of governments more fanatical and cruel, or of people more debased and oppressed than were to be found in these Khánates, which showed, as Vambéry said, to what a state of degradation tyranny allied with fanaticism might reduce a people. In the interests of humanity he wished to see the absorption by Russia of these countries, although the result might be to make Russia a great Power in Central Asia. He believed that Russian rule would be as great a benefit to these countries as English rule had been to India. Prince Gortchakoff had said no one would now wish to see British rule withdrawn from India; and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the English Government had said that he saw nothing to complain of in the action of Russia against Khiva. Let us be as fair towards Russia as she seemed disposed to be towards us. We had never given up an inch of territory once acquired in India. Why, then, should we be always nagging Russia for doing the same in Central Asia? Turning to the Correspondence, he thought it clear that Prince Gortchakoff acceded to our view on the implied condition that we should be held responsible for the good conduct of the Afghans. But we could not be really responsible for the conduct of a weak ruler and a turbulent people unless we assumed the control and direction of their affairs, and to do this we must place British officers in power at Cabul, and support their authority by a military force. The result of the policy foreshadowed in these Papers would probably be such that within a few years he fully expected to see British political officers in Afghanistan. Now, our true policy was to avoid all entangling alliances with that country. Whatever European Power first entered Afghanistan would make the Afghans their enemy. Our re-appearance in that country would revive the memories of our former occupation in the minds of the people. Whatever dependence might be placed on the ruler of that
